Sir, there is no business that promises any certain return, no income that is longer reliable, except that arising from the interest on money. The farmer with industry and close economy cannot pay taxes and current expenses. The merchant with goods on his shelves constantly shrinking in value cannot successfully carry on his business. Manufacturing establishments all over the country are closed. The mechanic is idle and the laborer seeks in vain for employment. This picture is but faintly drawn. Language cannot properly describe the ruin that now like the darkness of night hangs over every business interest of this country.

What relief is promised the country by the party in power?

The resumption of specie payments in 1879! The retirement of the whole greenback circulation on and after the 1st day of January, 1879! What does this mean? It means a further depreciation in all values, except the value of bonds and mortgages, of from 25 to 50 per cent. It means an appreciation in the value of bonds and mortgages of at least 25 to 50 per cent. Under this policy the farm that was mortgaged a few years ago at one-third its value will be sold to pay the debt, and the mortgager will be unable to redeem it. The merchant who bought his goods on the greenback basis will be required to pay for them on the gold basis. The manufacturer will find no purchasers for his fabrics, for but few will have the means to buy. The farmer will find but an indifferent market for his products, because the consumer being in enforced idleness will make but an indifferent customer.

This unfortunate condition of all our industrial interests is greatly aggravated, if it does not directly result from, the so-called resumption act. The arbitrary declaration of that law that there shall be a resumption of specie payments on and after January 1, 1879, is a standing menace to every man proposing to invest in property or in business pursuits that he does so at the peril of depreciation in values and with a certainty of loss, if not of financial ruin. This act, in effect, commands the holder of money to lock it up to await the day fixed for its redemption in gold, thereby avoiding the danger of loss from the threatened insolvency of the man who borrows, and with the sure prospect of a fair rate of interest by holding it until the day of its redemption.

The great army of energetic business men who build railroads and factories and open new farms, who exchange the products of industry and give life and vitality to trade and commerce, are commanded to stand still and wait until that other army "who toil not, neither do they spin," shall gather the golden harvest in the shape of usury, increased threefold by the appreciation in the value of their property and the depreciation in all other values, resulting from this legislation. Sir, in conclusion, the resumption act and preceding financial legislation have been the result of republican control; they have been consistent in the policy of protection of capital and consequent war on all the labor, industrial, mechanical, and manufacturing interests.

The Saint Louis platform demands the repeal of the oppressive part of the resumption act. Preceding republican legislation by ingenious contrivance has fastened its evil effects so that a remedy is beyond the power of the people. The demand of the democracy represents the universal desire and the absolute need of the people. The resumption act must be repealed.

Resumption of Specie Payments.

SPEECH OF HON. B. T. EAMES,

OF RHODE ISLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 26, 1876

On the bill (H. R. No. 3910) in addition to an act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875.

Mr. EAMES. Mr. Speaker, the question of the finances of the country is by far the most important question upon which Congress is called upon at this session to act. If the natural laws of trade were now determining the volume of currency required as a medium of exchange in the business of the country, there would be no occasion or necessity for any legislation upon this question. But the exigency arising from the necessities of the Government to preserve the national Union and the life of the Republic interfered with the operation of these laws in the supply of a medium of exchange, and forced the issue of a currency which, measured by the standard of value recognized in the commercial world and fixed as the standard by the Constitution, has varied in the course of thirteen years from par in gold to forty cents on the dollar, and is now depreciated so that $1.12 in legal-tender is only equal to a dollar in coin. And this value is varying from day to day, thus rendering the existing currency, consisting of legal-tenders and national-bank notes, uncertain as a measure of value in the business transactions of the country.

It is of no practical consequence how this state of things has arisen, whether by mistakes made in the hour of the nation's great peril during the war, or since its close, nor of the least consequence to assert that it might have been avoided. It is sufficient to know that it exists, and that the national currency is constantly changing in its purchasable value and that the evils arising from such changes demand such remedy as is in the power of Congress by legislation to apply to appreciate the currency of the country to the standard fixed by the commercial world and by the Constitution.

The necessity of a certain standard as a measure of value for the business purposes of a nation is as imperative as is that of a fixed standard of weights and measures. Without such standard of value the price of all commodities would vary from time to time as certainly as if the ounces to the pound or the inches to the foot or the yard should be from time to time changed. One nation might perhaps adopt such standards in these respects as it deemed would best subserve the convenience of its own interests and its own people, and perhaps no harm or inconvenience would arise so long as its dealings were confined within its own limits and to its own people; and it may be as to its standard of weights and measures, without any real harm to its own interests or in its dealings with other nations, because the price paid would in every case be determined by the quantity and quality of the article. But by the common consent of the civilized world gold and silver have been designated as the measure or standard of values, and unless a nation shall pursue the suicidal policy of limiting itself to internal commerce and trade with its own people, it must of necessity in its dealings with other nations adopt this generally recognized standard of value. It would be a matter of great convenience if all nations would agree upon a common standard of weights and measures. It is a necessity, so far as one nation deals with another nation, to assent to the standard of gold and silver as the measure of values, and no better standard of value exists. In our Government they have, except in cases of great emergency, been assented to as the standard by which to measure all values in business transactions, and they are under the Constitution the only legal measure of values.

We live under a government of law, and that law gives exclusively to Congress the power to coin money. It certainly confers no power to coin paper or to print or mint paper as money. And although great exigencies may justify the making a promise of the Government to pay a dollar a legal tender, it certainly never was intended by the provision of the Constitution that anything but gold and silver should be the permanent standard or measure of values. One of these occasions was the recent rebellion. It necessitated the issue of the legal-tender note. That strife at least for the present, and I hope forever, has been determined, and the time has come when, so far as it may be done by Congress, steps should be taken to bring the currency of the country to par in its purchasable value to the standard of gold and silver—in the words of the Constitution, to coin. The policy has been in this direction since the close of the war. First in the retirement of the legal-tenders when Mr. McCulloch was Secretary of the Treasury. Then by the act of March 18, 1869, which solemnly pledged the faith of the United States to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin. Also by the fourth and sixth sections of the act of June 20, 1874, and especially by the act of January 14, 1875, which provided for the issue of silver coin for the redemption of fractional currency, fixed the 1st day of January, 1879, for the redemption in coin of the legal-tenders and at the same time provided for the supply of currency necessary for the purposes of trade and commerce upon the principle of supply and demand by the system of free banking under the national-bank law, as amended by the provisions of that act.

The action of the republican party in fixing the 1st day of January, 1879, for the redemption of the legal-tenders may not have been wise. It may have been better not to have fixed a definite time so near in the future for the payment and redemption of the legal-tender notes. But whether wise or not the time has been fixed by law. And in the present depressed condition of trade and the industries of the country it is the imperative duty of Congress to adopt such measures as will, so far as legislation can, give relief, and this, too, without regard to party and especially without regard to the approaching struggle between the great political parties of the country to secure political power.

Mr. Speaker, I am a republican, and have been identified with the republican party from its organization. I am as an American citizen proud of its achievements in the past and sincerely believe in the necessity of its continuance in power in the future in order to secure the general welfare, but I am opposed upon this question of the finances, in the consideration of any remedy which may be here proposed, to making it a political question.

The business and industries of the country, as well in internal as in foreign commerce and trade, can never rest on a solid and sure foundation until the medium of exchange has a fixed and certain standard recognized by the commercial world.

It is therefore of the first importance to attain this end, and it is the duty of Congress, so far as this end may be accomplished by legislation, to adopt such measures as will secure it. And it is simply our duty as members of this Congress to pass such laws upon this subject as will best subserve the great interests of the country and restore to life and activity the present depressed industries so far as this may be done by any legislation relating to the currency.

The delicate and difficult question is, how shall this be done? Various plans for this purpose have been proposed, some of which I propose briefly to examine and then to suggest another which I think will accomplish the end without any change in existing laws, without either contracting or inflating the existing volume of currency, and without to any considerable extent disturbing the existing business relations of the country.

All agree that property has depreciated in value; that the industries of the country are depressed; that capital is uninvested, and labor to a considerable extent unemployed; but there is a difference of opinion as to the occasion which gives rise to this state of things. It is attributed by some to the burden imposed by taxes upon the industries of the country to meet the interest upon the public debt and to reduce the principal of that debt, and by others to speculation and overproduction, and by others still to the fluctuations in the currency, the contraction or inflation of its volume. No doubt the present condition of the country may be attributed to each and all of these causes.

The remedy proposed by some, so far as the currency is one of the causes for this result, is the repeal of the time fixed by the act of January 14, 1875, for the redemption in coin of the legal-tender notes; and the repeal of that clause of the act is demanded as a means of and sure to secure immediate relief. I think otherwise. If the legal-tender notes are to be redeemed at all, it is necessary to fix some time when it shall be done. If no time had been designated, perhaps it would not be wise now to name that particular time, but a day more remote. But the time has been named by that act, and when named was a notice to the trade and commerce of the country for a period of four years that on the 1st day of January, 1879, the Government would redeem its promise by paying on presentation its legal-tender notes. In the mean time the business and industries of the country, in view of this declared purpose, have prepared and will continue to prepare for it. If the time named is too soon and resumption shall not then be practicable, Congress, at either of the three sessions which will intervene, may extend the time to a future day. There is certainly no occasion to make that change now. To do so will be a step in the wrong direction. It will be far better by some judicious measure to be ready on that day to meet with coin the outstanding United States notes. To repeal this provision of the act of January, 1875, now, a period of two and a half years before the time fixed, will render wholly uncertain and indefinite when resumption shall take place, and also will make a change which will render useless what has been already done in view of and in preparation for the time now fixed for resumption, as well as disturb and render uncertain all business operations so far as dependent upon a currency equivalent in purchasable value to coin, and besides will impair our credit in foreign nations, cause a decline in our securities, and prevent any further funding at a lower rate of interest of the public debt. These securities at home and abroad are held and their value depends upon keeping the pledged faith of the Government as made in the act of January 14, 1875. But there will be no occasion for any change of the time named, as I hope to show.

Another proposition which is urged as a remedy for the existing financial evils is the retirement of the national-bank notes and the substitution of legal tenders. This measure, in my judgment, would render still more uncertain the value of the legal-tender as a medium of exchange, and is open to the very serious objection of leaving to the discretion of Congress, subject to change from time to time, the volume of currency required for transacting the business of the country. This volume should be left to the law of supply and demand; and if left to the operation of this law will so regulate itself that whatever amount is required for the legitimate trade and commerce will be supplied. The Government of the United States ought not to act as a fiscal agent for the supply of the volume of currency required for trade and commerce. Such a power in Congress would be a dangerous power to exercise. It would unite what the people of a free government will never assent to—the purse and the sword. The legal-tender note is no better, in fact it is not so good security as the national-bank note. The legal tender is secured, it is true, by the resources of the nation; but the national-bank note will be as well secured so long as it is issued at the rate of 90 per cent., based upon the credit of the bonds of the United States. The national-bank note in this respect is as safe as the legal-tenders and it has the additional advantage of the liability of the stockholder to the amount of their shares in the capital stock, and also the right of the bill-holder to enforce payment in the courts not only against the stockholders, but also against the bank and its property. In addition to this, under free banking, as now provided for by law, the demands of trade will always be met by the necessary supply of currency. There will be in such case neither contraction nor inflation for any length of time; neither too little nor too much currency for the legitimate demands of trade and commerce.

The national-bank notes, therefore, in these respects are a safer currency than the legal-tender notes, and they are equally current in all parts of the country. Human wisdom never devised a better or safer mode of supplying a medium of exchange in business transactions than now exists in the national banks of the country. The only apology for substituting the legal-tender notes for them is to be found in the refusal by the Government to meet its just obligations in the money which is alone recognized by the Constitution as lawful.

There are two other plans which have been suggested in the direction of appreciating the legal-tender to par in coin: the one by funding them in long bonds at a small rate of interest, and the other by the purchase and retirement of a million or two millions monthly until the outstanding notes shall be reduced to a fixed amount, say three hundred millions. Either mode would no doubt result in appreciating the notes outstanding to par in coin, but both are open to the same objection, which in the present sensitive condition of the finances is insuperable, namely, the arbitrary contraction in fixed sums at stated periods of the existing volume of currency used for the purposes of business, including both legal-tender and national-bank notes. In the present condition of the business of the country the people will not assent to such arbitrary contraction.

The proposition which I make avoids both of these objections. It changes no existing law. It is simply a step in the direction of preparing for resumption at the time now fixed by law, and it proposes to accomplish this without either inflation or contraction of the present volume of currency, except only so far as the same may be increased or diminished under the operation of existing law; and it will also accomplish the purpose of appreciating to par in coin both the legal-tender and national-bank notes, without interfering with either the legal-tender or national-bank notes as a medium of exchange. The plan is this:

The Secretary of the Treasury is required, from and after the passage of the act and until the legal-tender notes shall be appreciated to par value in gold and shall be convertible into coin at the will of the holder, to retain in coin annually an amount equal to 6 per cent. of the legal-tenders outstanding, for the purpose of redeeming and paying any legal-tender note which may be presented for redemption and payment on or after the 1st day of January, 1879.

The legal-tenders now outstanding, as appears by the last statement of the public debt, were about three hundred and seventy millions. Six per cent. upon this amount would be $22,200,000 to be set aside annually, and the amount accumulated on the 1st day of January, 1879, would be $55,500,000—15 per cent. of the present outstanding legal-tender notes. Two questions arise here upon this proposition: First, Can the Secretary from the receipts from custom duties set aside this amount of coin; and, second, will this amount, if reserved, be sufficient to appreciate the legal-tenders to par value in coin?

Both questions, I think, can with reasonable certainty be answered in the affirmative.

The amount received in coin for duties on imports during the last fiscal year was in round numbers $156,000,000. The interest on the public debt, which is payable in gold, is less than $100,000,000. The amount required to be set aside for the sinking fund is about thirty-two millions. The surplus of this coin has been during the last fiscal year applied to the reduction of the principal of the public debt and to the current expenses of the Government. The public debt during the last year from this and other sources of revenue has been reduced about thirty millions. If for a few years the policy shall be to make no payment of the principal of the unmatured public debt, the surplus of coin in the Treasury will be sufficient to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to retain the amount required of 6 per cent. annually without any additional taxes for revenue, even if, as is supposed, for a few years to come the duties on imports should be less by ten millions than they were in the last fiscal year.

The product of the mines of the country in gold and silver is amply sufficient to meet the balance of our indebtedness arising from any excess of imports over exports. In fact, that balance is now largely in our favor, and a large reserve of gold, from ten to twenty millions, has constantly been held in the Treasury over and above any demand for its use, either to pay the interest on the public debt, keep the sinking fund intact, or to meet any current gold obligation of the Government. It seems to me that this small amount of coin in the Treasury, gradually accumulated, would not raise the premium on gold or sensibly affect values or disturb to any extent the business interests of the country.

Will this reserve in coin be sufficient to appreciate the legal-tender to par in gold? I think it will. It requires but a small amount of gold to appreciate the legal-tender to par. It will be at par as soon as it is convertible into coin, and when this point is reached, it will be preferred to gold as a more convenient medium of exchange in business transactions.

If from now to the 1st of January, 1879, 6 per cent. of the outstanding legal-tenders is reserved there will on that day be in the Treasury 15 per cent. of the legal-tenders for the purpose of redeeming and paying such of the legal-tenders as may be presented for payment. Is this, with the surplus of coin in the Treasury, a sufficient amount to meet on demand any legal-tenders which may be presented?

Previous to the present national-bank act a system of banking existed under the State laws which was a safe and convenient mode of supplying the circulation which was required for the purposes of trade and commerce. This circulation was based on specie payment, and, although occasionally there was a suspension of specie payment, for nearly the whole time the bills of these banks, under the limitations and regulations which were imposed upon them, were at par with gold in their purchasable value.

It appears in a report on the finances, Executive Documents Nos. 2 and 3, first session Thirty-eighth Congress, that in 1863 there were fourteen hundred and sixty-six State banks and branches, the liabilities of which were, including capital, in the aggregate $1,191,749,945, and their total resources $1,185,491,728. In the same year the circulation and deposits of these banks were $632,363,444, and the aggregate amount of specie $101,227,369, or about $1 of specie for $6 of circulation and deposits, and, including other liabilities, about $1 in specie to $7 of liability. The proportion of specie to circulation and deposits, and also to other liabilities, is very nearly the same for the years intervening between 1851 and 1863.

It is quite apparent from this statement that the amount of specie required to appreciate the circulation of the State banks at par in its purchasable value was no larger in percentage than is proposed by this bill to appreciate the legal-tender to par; and it is certainly reasonable to infer that the legal-tender will not require a greater rate of percentage than was required by the State banks.

The evidence of bankers also confirms the statement that practically from 15 to 20 per cent. in coin of the liability is ample to keep bank circulation at par.

It should be kept in mind also in considering this question that the legal-tender notes are in circulation in all parts of the country, that they are a more convenient medium of exchange than coin, either gold or silver, and that consequently only such amount of the legal-tenders as may not be required for the purpose of trade and commerce will on the 1st day of January, 1879, or thereafter, be presented for payment. Whatever is required in trade will be kept in circulation and will be at par with, because it is convertible into, coin.

Less specie will be required for this purpose on account of the operation of the act of June 20, 1874, under which $50,000,000 have been retired by the national banks, and under the act of January 14, 1875, $12,000,000 of the legal-tenders.

Under the operation of this reservation of a small per cent. of gold as soon as the legal-tender is at par the national-bank note will also be at par.

If this policy shall be pursued the currency of the country, as well the national-bank note as the legal-tender, will be at par with coin in its purchasable value, and the very great evils arising from a currency which is constantly changing will be avoided.

This is but a simple step, but it is in the right direction, and is the true remedy to appreciate the existing circulation to par in coin. The fractional currency has been provided for, and this measure will provide for the legal-tender and national-bank notes.

Mr. Speaker, on the 9th of February, 1874, as a member of the Forty-third Congress I introduced a bill, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, in which the same plan for resuming specie payments was presented, except in that bill, which was introduced before the act of June 20, 1874, I also provided that the national banks, from the coin received as interest on bonds filed with the Treasurer to secure their liabilities to bill-holders and depositors, should reserve a small per cent. of the coin thus received to be counted as part of their reserve.

The proposition which I now make is merely for the General Government to reserve a certain per cent. in coin. There is now, as there was then, no occasion to require the national banks to make this reservation in coin, as the reserve of from 15 to 25 per cent. which they are required to hold in legal tenders will enable them to resume as soon as the General Government shall be prepared to redeem the legal tenders outstanding, which will, of course, include the reserves in legal tenders now held by the national banks.

When, therefore, the Government is ready to meet any demand which will be made on it to redeem the legal-tenders, the national banks will also be in a condition to resume specie payments, and the existing medium of exchange, including both legal tenders and national-bank notes, will be at par with and equal in purchasable value to coin.

If the bill I then introduced had become the law, I sincerely believe that to-day this question would not have been here for our action, and if substantially the same idea should now become law I as sincerely believe that on the 1st day of January, 1879, the present medium of exchange will be equal in value for the purpose of trade to the standard which is fixed as money by the Constitution; and we of this Congress will have solved the delicate and difficult problem of furnishing to the trade and commerce of the country a circulating medium which will be exempt from the fluctuations of the existing currency, and one upon which the business interests can rely as a fixed and certain standard of value.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the members of this House to consider this proposition carefully without regard to political platforms or political effect; and I make this appeal in the belief that if this proposition shall become the law it will appreciate in its purchasable value the existing currency to par with coin, and will so far as legislation upon the question of the finances can, restore life and activity to the present depressed condition of the labor and industries of the country.

Expenditure of the Foreign Naval Account.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN M. GLOVER,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 1, 1876,

On the report of the Committee on the Real-Estate Pool in regard to the expenditures and financial affairs of the Navy Department.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of the House I will give a statement of the facts and the history of the management of this foreign naval account with the house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., of London. When Mr. Robeson became Secretary of the Navy, the old, wealthy, and world-renowned House of Baring Brothers was the "temporary special agent" of the Navy Department for receiving and disbursing the naval fund for the foreign service.

That house had acted in that capacity with perfect satisfaction and safety to the Government for more than half a century.

In May, 1871, this solid and venerable house which had given such general satisfaction was discontinued, and the house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., without age, credit, or capital, was substituted. In making this change, the suggestions of common duty, to say nothing of sworn official obligations, should have instigated a most rigid and thorough scrutiny into the resources of this new house to determine whether it was a safe depository for the millions of the public money destined to go into it.

But it appears, sir, from the evidence in this case, elicited by the committee from the Secretary himself, that no examination or investigation to this important end was ever instituted.

In answer to the interrogatories, "If he made inquiries to ascertain the extent of responsibility of the firm of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. before making deposit of the public money, and whether he knew that firm had no capital stock," the Secretary replied:

I understood from their partners or agents in this country that they were a strong firm, with good working capital and ample resources in reserve; and after the failure of Jay Cooke & Co. I was informed directly from the firm of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. through dispatches to their agents in the country that their private ledger still showed a very large working capital besides all their other property and assets.

Yet, in the face of this statement, the house of Jay Cooke & Co. in this country failing on the 18th day of September, 1873, he sent to Paymaster-General John O. Bradford of the Navy, through the hands of Pay Director of the Navy George F. Cutter, of New York, between the 24th day of September and the 12th day of November, 1873, sums aggregating $1,735,555.56, $1,100,000 of which he ordered Bradford to deliver to the house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. with which to pay their general indebtedness, and with the balance himself to take up all the naval drafts drawn on the house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., which order Mr. Bradford swears he executed. The House will note the novel manner of ascertaining the questionable solvency of a foreign banking firm, into whose coffers it is proposed to place millions of the public money, and which public money was to act as a decoy to bring millions more from unsuspecting depositors into the possession of this banking firm, by simply taking the statement of the firm and that of its friends, rather than to have made a close and rigid examination of its books and into all its resources.

Sir, from all the facts and circumstances in relation to this change of the agency from the Baring Brothers to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., I am sensibly impressed with the conviction that some other consideration than the safety of the naval fund alone influenced the action of the Secretary of the Navy. Section 1550 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides—

That no person shall be employed or continued abroad to receive and pay money for the use of the naval service on foreign stations, whether under contract or otherwise, who has not been or shall not be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with their colossal wealth, their world-wide credit and unshaken stability, for nearly a century the house of Baring Brothers was so confirmed. Why was this infantile house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. not confirmed? Why was the successor to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., the house of Seligman Brothers, confirmed a few months ago upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy?

These facts, Mr. Speaker, are significant. Why should these old and strong houses be confirmed and the weak house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. not be confirmed? Sir, I have a theory about it, and I believe my theory is true and is supported by the facts in the case. As I said before, sir, this change was made for other purposes than the mere safety of the naval fund and the good of the public service. Some other consideration personal and profitable to some one, I believe I am justified in saying, controlled the matter of the removal of this agency to this new and unestablished house. It is now well known that the house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. was a mushroom concern—an empty bubble that was destined to burst in the first financial storm that swept over it unless supported by the Treasury of the United States, as all the banking houses of Jay Cooke & Co. have been. This bank of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. was a fraud upon the financial world. I am well convinced, sir, that this banking venture of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. would never have been carried out but for an assurance that it was to have the deposit of the foreign naval account.

It is stated by a journal no less able and responsible than the Chicago Times that this account was offered in 1869 to a then existing house on condition that Orville Grant should share the profits of its use. Whether this is true or not, certain it is that Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. had no capital. Their first deposit was a million of dollars by Jay Cooke & Co. In about two years and a half they made a million dollars of profits, or $400,000 a year, and Jay Cooke & Co. withdrew their deposited million, these profits being substituted and treated as capital.

How these great profits were obtained in a market where 5 per cent. is a high interest appears from the following facts: The money was usually transmitted to Jay Cooke & Co., at New York, who could profit by its use, and would buy bills of exchange in favor of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. These bills being due at thirty, sixty, or ninety days after presentation to the drawees at London were not credited to the United States till they matured; mean time Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. could get them discounted or borrow money, using them as security. The house doing ten to fifteen millions of dollars of business needed a large working balance. This they obtained from the proceeds of bills of exchange after crediting these proceeds; and the balance of public money in their hands sometimes exceeded $1,600,000 at a time—sixteen times the amount for which they were under bonds. It is true they allowed the Government 4 per cent. interest on such balances; but it is also true that the Government allowed them 1 per cent. on all moneys disbursed by them on its account, including these balances. Hence, while they paid the Government (in two years) to June 30, 1873, over $50,000 in interest, the Government in the same time paid them over $60,000 in commissions, so that they actually had the use of these great sums at the greatest market in the world free of charge, and mainly without even giving security.

Now why was the house not nominated to the Senate for confirmation? For no other reason, sir, in my opinion, than that it had not sufficient resources and that if it had been nominated the debates on the subject in the Senate would have revealed this fact and have defeated the confirmation. For this reason, sir, and for other reasons this usurpation of power and gross violation of a plain statute were committed. This weak bantling of administration favoritism having been set up, it is now necessary to sustain it at the public expense out of the Treasury of the United States. In his sworn testimony before the committee on the 25th of July the Secretary said "that he had remitted about a million of dollars each quarter to the house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. In answer to a question, how much he had remitted to the Baring Brothers, he said: "About the same amount." It appears, sir, by the statement of the Secretary of the Navy in his letter of March 23 to the committee that during the year 1869 only $2,000,000 were remitted to Baring Brothers to meet the naval drafts. In the year 1870 there was remitted to the same house the sum of $2,500,000. To May 11 of the year 1871, the time at which remittances ceased to that house, the sum of $1,798,708.24 was remitted, aggregating in about two years and four months the sum of $6,298,708.24.

Now I call the attention of the House to the increased remittances made to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. from the day they received the agency. For the remaining portion of the year 1871, after Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. became the agent of the Navy Department, embracing seven months and nineteen days, there was remitted to them the sum of $3,000,000, which was $500,000 more for these seven months and nineteen days than was remitted to the Barings for any one year, given by the Secretary to the committee.

For the year 1872 there was remitted to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. the sum of $3,500,000, one million more than was sent to the Barings in any given year. Then taking the year 1873 and combining the remittances of that year to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. with those sent to Bradford, the Paymaster-General of the Navy, then in England, and which were all used, either as loans to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., or for paying the Navy drafts which that house should have paid, the sum aggregates $3,950,000, of which the sum of over one million was advanced as a loan to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., not one dollar of which was used by them to pay Navy drafts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the House and the country can have some faint conception how the public money has been diverted to private ends by a high and sworn official of the Government. This is but in keeping with practices in some other Departments of the Government: in the case of the Treasury Department during the years 1867 and 1868, when the agents of the banking-house of Jay Cooke & Co. could enter the Treasury Department and procure a loan of from $50,000 to $100,000 at a time when it suited their convenience. These are some of the ways in which the public money has been used and the manner in which public officials have prostituted their sacred trusts under republican rule.

Now I come back to the remittances to England for naval purposes. After the Government had dissolved its relations with the house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., and ceased its remittances to that house for the payment of its general indebtedness, the remittances fell down, in the year 1874, to $1,924,375.43. As I stated before, the remittances to the Barings for a period of two years and four months aggregated the sum of $6,298,708.24. It appears from the statement of the Secretary of the Navy and from the official account of Pay Director Cutter, of New York, that during a period of two years seven months and ten days the enormous sum of $10,450,000 was remitted to London, which could be legitimately used only to pay Navy drafts which were drawn upon that house.

Permit me now to present the contrast more sharply. In two years four months and eleven days there was sent to Barings the sum of $6,298,708.24; to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., and to Bradford for them, in two years seven months and ten days, the sum of $10,450,000; making an excess of remittance to the house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., including a small excess of time, of the sum of $4,151,291.76. Omitting the amount of the direct loan to this firm by the order of the Secretary of the Navy to Mr. Bradford of the sum of $1,100,000 to meet the debts of their English creditors to save this deceitful and rotten bank, whose character and condition must have been known or should have been known to the Secretary, this house has had excessive remittances for nearly the same time of $3,051,298.76.

The evidence is strong in its tendency to prove that not only the Navy but the Treasury Department had suspicions of the coming failure, first of the firm of Jay Cooke & Co. of this country and next of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., of England. For by reference to the following dispatches of September 16 and 18, 1873, it will be seen that an attempt was made to aid the house of Jay Cooke & Co. by the use of $1,000,000 two days before its failure, and failing to get the money the house went down on the 18th of September, 1873.

LONG BRANCH, September 16, 1873.

Commodore WILLIAM REYNOLDS,
Acting Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.:

Give requisition in favor of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. for $1,000,000 for for eign account out of pay of Navy.

GEORGE M. ROBESON.

The following is an answer to the foregoing dispatch:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 18, 1873.

Hon. GEORGE M. ROBESON,
Monmouth Branch, Long Branch, New Jersey:

Remittance to London stopped by the Treasury.

WILLIAM REYNOLDS,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

After the failure of the house of Jay Cooke & Co. over here, there seemed to be great solicitude for the house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., as shown by the following telegrams:

LONG BRANCH, N. J., September 23, 1873.

Commodore REYNOLDS,
Acting Secretary Navy, Washington, D. C.:

Telegraphed you to-day to give Cutter requisition for $500,000. Give him another for $1,000,000 in addition. Make special. Go in person to Secretary of Treasury, to put through by telegraph. Act promptly. Answer to No. 29 Broadway.

GEORGE M. ROBESON, Secretary.

The answer:

[Immediate.]

WASHINGTON, September 24, 1873.

To the SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
29 Broadway, New York:

Telegram received. Have seen Secretary Treasury. Requisition will be put through by telegraph.

WILLIAM REYNOLDS,
Acting Secretary Navy.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 24, 1873.

To GEORGE M. ROBESON,
Care Pay-Director G. F. Cutter,
29 Broadway, New York:

Requisitions through; amount to credit of Cutter, on assistant treasurer's books, New York.

WILLIAM REYNOLDS,
Acting Secretary Navy.

These and other telegrams show the solicitude of the Secretary for the fate of this house, although he said in his letter to the committee, previously quoted, that "after the failure of Jay Cooke & Co. * * * their private ledger still showed a very large working capital." Nevertheless he now transfers with great haste to Bradford, London, $1,500,000, to be used as hereafter explained. The Secretary seeks to justify this violation of law and hazard of a large sum of the public money by an assumption which is unsupported by the evidence before the committee.

On the day of the failure of the house of Jay Cooke & Co., September 18, 1873, the statement of account furnished by the Treasury Department shows that instead of there being a balance in the hands of this firm in favor of the Government, the Government owed Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. a balance of $190,000. The way this pretended balance was made up is as follows: On the 2d day of July, 1873, on a requisition from the Navy Department, a draft was drawn by the Treasury Department in favor of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. This draft, which is the basis of the assumed balance, was drawn by the Treasury Department on the assistant treasurer at New York; was paid four days after it was made, but the evidence before the committee does not prove that its proceeds ever reached Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. It is true that the draft is reported by the Treasury as bearing their indorsement, but the date at which payment was made shows that this indorsement was given in this country and hence must have been given by one of the American partners in both firms. Paymaster-General Bradford testifies that he was informed by London members of the house that they never received the money. The Secretary testified to the same; nevertheless on the 22d of September, when they had lost ability to meet such a responsibility, they assumed it and charged themselves with it; having omitted to do so on the 8th of July, the time at which the Secretary states they charged themselves and became liable.

These strange facts go far to impress me with a strong belief that this assumption of indebtedness at this critical moment, the 22d of September, 1873, was extemporized merely as a pretext for additional advances to save that which could have been better saved by relying upon the American estate of Jay Cooke & Co., which firm the London house charged with having appropriated the money. It is simply ridiculous for the Secretary of the Navy to pretend that additional loans, secured by collaterals, were necessary to save a balance, even had it existed, when under the provisions of our attachment and bankrupt laws all the tangible and available assets of both Jay Cooke & Co. and Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. in this country were within the easy reach of the Secretary of the Navy.

Now, I do not hesitate to say that it is my firm belief that had the Secretary desired above all things, in connection with this matter, to save the so-called balances in the hands of this house, it was an easy achievement had he gone at it with a purpose and a determination. It might have been accomplished in either one of three ways. Instead of engaging himself in sending hasty and excited dispatches to the Acting Secretary of the Navy for the purpose of hurrying more money out of the Treasury, he should have busied himself in finding out from whom and to whom was the sixty days' bill of exchange not yet matured but purchased with the million of dollars belonging to the Government of the United States. Having found out these things he should have invoked the co-operation of both parties, drawer and drawee, and demanded a suspension of its payment. No respectable banking house under the circumstances would have refused or failed to obey such a demand, especially if promised indemnity.

The Secretary had from the 18th to the 22d of September in which to do this thing. Paymaster Bradford, then in London, and on the spot, says the time was ample in which to have stopped the payment of the bill, but that he could not have stopped it without disobeying the orders of the Secretary. Did the Secretary make an effort? It does not appear that so reasonable, so timely, and so natural an idea entered his head. So he allowed the house to be made debtor to the Government for nearly $1,000,000, to become a basis in a short time for new advances or loans to this firm under the specious plea of saving what the house ought never to have received under the circumstances, if indeed it ever received it. At that time Mr. McCulloch was in New York and the Secretary was in frequent consultation with him.

The testimony of Paymaster-General Bradford is clear that if the balances were not withdrawn from the house, it would go through and survive. Now, the very existence of this banking house was in the hands of the Secretary. "To be or not to be" was with him to say, and that, too, without loaning a dollar. Did he go to Mr. McCulloch with the voice of decision and determination which the occasion required, and which should have been found in the person of a Cabinet minister and upon the penalty of closing the house, demand ample and immediate security for the balances then in his hands, and which subsequent events so clearly proved the house could have given? There is no evidence that he did. Had this demand been declined, which no reasonable man can believe would have been the case, then he should have withdrawn his balances or have attempted to do so, though the house had immediately suspended. Had he done this, his action would have met the judgment and approval of the American people. The demand would have been just and appropriate, because the house had the ability to secure the debt, and in the eyes of honorable men would have been left without an excuse had it refused.

The bare fact that the house was so weak that the withdrawal of the United States account would hurt its credit and risk its bankruptcy should have moved him to this course. Knowing this weakness, he should not have trusted it with another dollar on any terms, even had the security offered been good. But doing so, he should have taken care to inform himself of the nature of and title to the security that he accepted, which would have saved him and the Government from becoming—unconsciously as he claims—parties to the fraud on the Dutch bondholders of the Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad, perpetrated by Moorhead and his partners in the American and London houses. The Secretary's claim that he did not know how Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. came by the iron rails which these men pledged to him does not well agree with the statement of Francis O. French, McCulloch's New York agent, who, in the suit brought by the Dutch bondholders to recover their property, swore that by McCulloch's direction he "laid the whole facts before Mr. Robeson." Either way the Secretary stands in the position of aiding to defraud the innocent victims. At all events, it was needless for him to advance Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. any more money, even to meet drafts, and equally needless to keep Bradford there for that purpose. All he needed to do was to instruct Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. to continue accepting drafts and making them payable at Williams, Deacon & Co., and to place Williams, Deacon & Co. in funds to meet such drafts. He could then have at once arranged with Baring Brothers or some other reliable house to meet new drafts and have instructed paymasters to draw on them.

The position assumed by Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., that if the account was not taken from them they could get safely through, indicates either that they were anxious to prevent this stoppage of the bill of exchange, or that they charged themselves with it, when they could have justly refused to do so and have referred the Government to the last indorsers, Jay Cooke & Co., who actually collected the draft. If they took the latter course it was plainly for a purpose, and that purpose subsequent events reveal. Paymaster-General Bradford's testimony shows that the transactions of September were distinct from that of October, and his account furnished by the Treasury confirms this. It will be remembered that just after Jay Cooke & Co.'s failure they published a dispatch from Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., giving directions to draw on the latter for whatever was necessary to carry the former through. As the American house was indebted to the London one to the extent of over two and a half millions of dollars, having withdrawn its original deposit, borrowed a million from them on Dutch bondholders' iron, drawn $650,000 out additional, and defaulted to them for $1,000,000 besides, this offer was, to say the least, suspicious.

Taken in connection with the haste exhibited by the Secretary's telegrams and with the strenuous efforts of Jay Cooke & Co. to effect a composition with their creditors, and thus to avoid any publicity of their affairs, it would seem that the object of telegraphing Bradford $1,000,000, September 24 was to enable Jay Cooke & Co. to fulfill the programme foreshadowed in Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co.'s dispatch, to pacify influential creditors, and complete the private composition with the rest. This view is strengthened by the fact that during September and October Bradford paid no drafts. But the day after the money left Cutter's hands at New York, the very day Bradford received it, petitions in bankruptcy were filed against Jay Cooke & Co., which stopped their attempts to do business and made this programme useless. Had Bradford been called on to pay drafts in September and October, this would have relieved the London house of the necessity of doing so, and have been a virtual loan to the house during those months. That this was not done shows that this was not the object of the September transfer.

The October transaction seems to have been an after-thought. According to Bradford, the house, out of the $850,000 admitted by McCulloch to be due after the failure, went on and paid drafts to the extent of $250,000, after which they found themselves unable to continue. It has been intimated to me from another source that McCulloch then represented to Robeson that if the house was not aided it would fail, and that the country would hold him responsible for the loss of $600,000. Bradford testifies repeatedly that the object was to save this balance by aiding—really by saving—the house, and this testimony and action contrast strangely with the Secretary's declaration that he did not know that the house was in danger. The first action in October, so far as known, was the dispatch from Robeson, October the 11th, authorizing Bradford "to protect inconveniencing drafts."

Bradford's account shows that he did not take up paymasters' drafts till November 8, a week after he had paid Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. the last portion of the $900,000. October 20 he received from Cutter the $500,000 that had staid in New York ten days during the panic, and the same day paid over $400,000 to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., keeping the $1,000,000 received September 25 till November 1, when he handed over half of this also to them. This does not seem to have been enough to make the house safe, for November 14 he accommodated them with $200,000 more. Noteworthy features of this transaction are that security was professedly taken, that most of this security was equitably worthless as such; that the money was not used for naval purposes, and that it was repaid not by disbursement on naval account, but like any other loan, by refunds of the cash and sales of securities. The statement that the firm going into liquidation has prevented earlier repayment shows plainly that the money was used for business and not for naval purposes. Had it been held in readiness to meet drafts, it could have been turned over to Bradford, Barings, or Seligmans, when liquidation began. Much stress is laid on the fact that $750,000 of this $1,100,000 is said to have been returned; but $350,000 remain still on loan at last advices, and more than half of what has been returned is acknowledged to have been so since this investigation was begun.

How much would have been returned but for the publicity the transaction would have received and how much longer the $750,000 would have remained on loan is a question; for it is with the Secretary and his friends the Cattells when credit shall be given to the Government for the proceeds of these collaterals. It is highly probable that the sum which has been returned to the Treasury is due to the ventilation the matter has received rather than to any diligence on the part of the Secretary. Another highly noteworthy feature of this October transaction is that the transmission of the money to London was accomplished by Cutter's buying bills of exchange from the New York agent of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., Francis Ormond French, which indicates that the money was really put into thei. hands at the start and only nominally passed through the hands of Bradford. Several appropriations were trenched on to supply the funds advanced to the London house, and even the pay of the Navy was for a time withheld that enough might be placed with the house to sustain it. The pretext that this money was to be used in continuation of the naval account does not hold; for the naval account was immediately transferred to Bradford, who took up the drafts and relieved the house. Had nothing more been done, this relief to the house would have been in effect a loan to the amount of the drafts they would otherwise have had to pay. Had the Secretary stopped here by simply allowing them time instead of compelling them to meet their obligations promptly, he might have been excused for a mistaken mode "of dealing gently" with an unfortunate house; but when he goes on to lend them over a million more, all excuses fail.

The motive for all this favor may perhaps be found in the fact that Robeson's intimate friends and creditors, A. G. and E. G. Cattell, were Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co.'s bondsmen, and had the house failed, must have lost $100,000. Now, as I have before stated, there was a third remedy, which was perfect and complete, in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy of which he could have immediately availed himself. The basis of this balance or debt was a Treasury draft made to the order of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. This draft was indorsed by Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. and by Jay Cooke & Co., both of these banking firms having representatives in this country and vast tangible and available resources which would have inured to the Government as a preferred creditor either in attachment or bankrupt proceedings. So, I repeat, that when the Secretary pretends that there was no other way for him to do than to make other advances to this firm to secure a liability which he could have prevented, his pretext is untrue and insincere. He states on oath that before any of his new deposits or advances were made to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. the balances had been reduced to $600,000. Mr. Bradford confirms this statement. Now I will show to this House and to the country by the statements of the Secretary himself that before he made the first of his last advances, on October 20, 1873, to the firm of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. he had within his reach in this country property enough of this firm alone to more than secure the balances in question. In the testimony of the Secretary, given a few days since before the committee, it is stated that he had received partial security for these balances. I will now enumerate those assets within his reach in this country:

Railroad bonds worth	$120,000 00
Syndicate claim, (on Treasury)	146,276 15
Railroad iron	200,000 00
Private estate of Hugh McCulloch	150,000 00
Official bond of house, (Cattells)	100,000 00
Making	716,276 15

Deducting amount of balances, $600,000, we have, after securing the debt, $116,276.15 surplus. This, too, without touching any of the assets of Jay Cooke & Co., all of which were liable and subject to the preferred claim of the Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what becomes of this flimsy and disingenuous pretext of the Secretary of the Navy that he was compelled to make further advances of $1,100,000 to save the sum of only $600,000, which he pretends was in danger of being lost, and which was used as a convenient and desirable excuse for doing what he did do? The Secretary, in his anxiety to furnish some plausible grounds for so unwarrantable a use of the public money, asserted that a portion of the £220,000, or $1,100,000, was used to pay Navy drafts by Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., in further support of his assertion and theory of justification. This is flatly and pointedly contradicted by Paymaster-General Bradford, who was present and paid over the money to this firm, and declares that he himself paid all the drafts out of another fund under the orders of the Secretary. That not one dollar of this £220,000 was paid on Navy drafts by this firm is proved by the Secretary in his letter to the committee and in his oral testimony, which shows that before he made additional advances on collateral securities the existing balance was $600,000. After that he advanced $1,100,000, making $1,700,000.

The Secretary has stated in two forms that when the firm of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. ceased to pay Navy drafts they were owing the Government $1,400,000, showing that they had not touched a cent of the $1,100,000 or the £220,000 to take up Navy drafts, the contrary of which he has boldly asserted. The statements that the Executive Departments in rendering information on this subject have arranged that information so as to make close and deliberate scrutiny needful to ascertain the truth is borne out by the facts that, while the payment of interest by Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. is dwelt on, the allowance of commissions is lightly passed over, while its effect is ignored, and that nothing was said about the use of time-bills in remitting till the practice was elicited by repeated inquiry, while the use that can be made of them has never been stated at all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to pronounce the severest condemnation on this corrupting and antiquated custom and system of transmitting money to London to sustain our foreign naval account by bills of exchange at sixty and ninety days. It originated in the olden time when the uncertainty and slowness of sailing ships constituted our only means of communication with Europe; but in these latter days of fast steamers and the telegraph lines why has not our enterprising and progressive Secretary of the Navy utterly annihilated it and substituted more direct, less tempting, less dangerous, and less corrupting means of remitting to London our naval funds?

By this method the public money goes into irresponsible hands, where it may be and doubtless has been used for speculation or loaned for the larger portion of the interval of time to the profit of those who have the handling. It is a fact that the sum of $500,000 was in the hands of one of these agents for ten days in New York during the height of the panic in September, 1873, during which time, with the use of that amount of gold, a fortune could have been secretly made and then the money be sent to its destination. This method is also wholly needless, as the banking-house which meets naval drafts can re-imburse itself at once by drawing and selling bills of exchange on the Secretary of the Navy.

Sir, this pernicious and dangerous custom gives the use of large sums of the public money to parties on one side or the other of the Atlantic for sixty or ninety days, when only about fifteen days are needed to transmit a bill of exchange purchased and sent by an officer of the Government. Every banker through whose hands it goes, every day added to the necessary time for its remittance, increases the danger of loss and gives opportunity to corrupt bank rings and Government officials to shave, speculate with, and loan large sums of gold.

The public money for years has been at the mercy and use of Jay Cooke & Co. on this side, or at the mercy and use of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. on the other side, wherever the greatest inducements were held out for profits. Sir, this rotten, dangerous, and tardy system which the present Secretary is following because others have done it before him should be abolished at once.

A more striking illustration of executive reluctance to give full information is the arrangement of Bradford's account-current, furnished by the Treasury, so as to conceal the holding of large balances by him, which a close analysis of that account reveals. He often held for some time balances of from $100,000 to $1,500,000, when there was no occasion for holding any, as he could at any time sell a bill of exchange on the Secretary of the Navy wherewith to take up a draft. Whether these large balances, both in September, 1873, and afterward, were held by him for some one's profit is not clearly ascertained; but he admits that considerable sums were on deposit at Morton, Rose & Co.'s without interest; and, though he claims that other banks where he kept part of the money paid $5,000 interest, the Government is not credited with this sum or any part of it in his account. Analysis of his account also reveals the fact that he repeatedly overdrew at his bank, sometimes to the extent of $300,000 at a time. As it was needless for him to do this unless appropriations had been misapplied, and as he "always acted under orders," it is tolerably clear that some one benefited by this course. He informed the committee that "on his credit as a United States officer he could have borrowed a million, if necessary."

This suggests the inquiry whether in some indirect way, which the interrogatories put to him failed to cover or develop, he did not, under secret instructions, do this very thing to somebody's profit. In this connection, the coincidence is curious, between his having been kept at London more than two years after the emergency which detained him from his regular duties had passed, including a year after Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co.'s successors, Seligman Brothers & Co. had been appointed and the large deposits in bank by Robeson, on his own personal account, during these two years. Bradford's bank account was largely overdrawn from February to July, 1874, which looks as though during that time the money that had been diverted from other appropriations to aid Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. was being quietly restored, money being meantime unlawfully borrowed to meet drafts.

Another case of misleading arrangement of information by the Departments is that, after the October transactions were complete, $900,000 of bills of exchange to Bradford's order were bought from Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co.'s New York agent, and appear on Bradford's account as transferred to them for disbursement; whence it follows that they were helped nearly a million more than Robeson has ever acknowledged.

Three hundred thousand dollars of this sum seems to have been used July 11, 1874, to make good Bradford's overdrafts at bank, and the remainder of that remittance of $700,000 was exhausted in a month and large overdrafts again began.

Now, sir, the Secretary persistently asserts that £220,000, or $1,100,000, was advanced to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. in continuation of the naval account. This would mean, under the law, that it was intended by him to be used for the payment of Navy drafts. This assumption and assertion by the Secretary are unsustained by one solitary reason or a scintilla of evidence except his own declaration. On the contrary, he knows that exactly the reverse is true; that this $1,100,000 which was paid to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. by General Bradford, by the special order of the Secretary, was an absolute loan of the public money, not one dollar of which was used to pay Navy drafts, he, the Secretary, directing the payment of all the drafts at that time by Bradford out of another fund. For all these reasons, and in view of the following statute, section 3670: "All sums appropriated for the various branches of expenditure in the public service shall be applied solely to the objects for which they are respectively made, and for no others," it is my firm and deliberate opinion that George M. Robeson, Secretary of the Navy, should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

The Partisan Attack on Secretary Robeson—Democratic Reform and their Platform Examined.

SPEECH OF HON. J. M. THORNBURGH,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 31, 1876,

On the report from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Mr. Speaker, months since when we saw the singular spectacle of the Naval Committee of this House sitting with closed doors, with the padlock of secrecy on the mouths of its members, and saw a cloud of witnesses hovering around the committee-room, composed to a very considerable extent of dishonest and discharged employés, disappointed bidders for contracts whose efforts to defraud the Navy Department had been seen and foiled, and persons of disreputable character, both men and women, some extremely partisan action like the report we have before us was easily foreseen. This secret star-chamber proceeding, after months of labor, have presented us a report which, without presenting specific charges against any one, yet throws a cloud of suspicion upon a large number of officers in our Navy whose gallant services in the past in the suppression of the rebellion and whose unstained honor has made them the pride of the Navy and of the nation. The extraordinary proposition is heard from the democratic majority to turn over the four thousand pages of printed testimony taken by one committee of this House to another committee, in order that they, who have had no time or opportunity to examine it, may ascertain whether the Secretary of the Navy—a man of unstained reputation heretofore—trusted and tried in other high official positions, has violated any law or committed any crime or misdemeanor for which he can be impeached.

The Committee on Naval Affairs in this report both directly and indirectly smirched his administration, and have left a cloud of charges floating indiscriminately over the heads of all the officers of the Navy. They have lacked the courage or ability to point out the law that has been violated and the man or men by name who have committed any offense. If the Secretary of the Navy has done anything to justify it, present articles of impeachment, and we will put him on trial. If he has not, let us have the courage and manliness to say so.

But it is easily seen that the purpose is in the closing hours of this session to shirk all such responsibility and fair dealing, and turn it over to another committee who will be unable to report at this session, so that the truth cannot be known and the officers of the Government vindicated until after the presidential election. This I submit will be to strike a cowardly blow and run away. This proposed action comports entirely with the policy pursued by the democratic majority in this House throughout this entire session. This is a specimen of the kind of reform which the democratic party is trying to commend to the American people. This Naval Committee has been laboring in the interest of reform, not the ordinary kind which commends itself by pointing out abuses and proposing clearly defined remedies, but a kind of reform that can be only defined by calling it democratic reform, the sort of reform which forms the burden of the Saint Louis platform. And, Mr. Speaker, as entirely germane to this subject, for this is purely a political and partisan report, made because the interests of the democratic party demand it, I will take the occasion to examine somewhat in detail the reform platform democracy recently adopted and the kind of reformer they have placed upon it to bring a political milennium in these degenerate days.

The following testimony, contained in the Credit Mobilier report, taken by a committee of this House, will show something of the kind of a reformer Governor Tilden is. In his testimony taken by that committee Mr. Oakes Ames, the head and front of the Credit Mobilier corporation, said:

By Mr. HOAR:

Question. Why, instead of issuing capital stock to make up the balance of the Oakes Ames contract, did you not simply issue bonds or notes or other evidence of indebtedness of the company for the balance?

Answer. And not have any stock?

Q. Have a subscription of such an amount as you choose—large enough to govern the company only. You had some stock subscribed, $2,000,000, and 10 per cent. paid in, before you started. I do not know that this has any bearing upon the case; but I wish to know why it was necessary to adopt this roundabout method of having the contractor nominally subscribe for a quantity of the stock. What advantage did you gain by the violation—for it was a violation—of the law?

A. Well, we wanted stock enough to vote on to control the road.

Q. But you have got nominally about $38,000,000 of stock there?

A. Yes, sir. Is that too much?

Q. I do not mean to intimate that it was too much; but is not the note of a corporation worth more than its capital stock?

A. It is not so good for the corporation, though, because they will have to pay the note, and the capital stock is good for nothing. Stock is considered the best form in which a company can put these things, because they ain't obliged to pay anything on it unless they earn the money.

Q. But suppose that precisely the same parties in interest had complied with the law which requires them to subscribe what capital stock there was in cash and had subscribed two, three, or five millions of dollars, and issued the notes of the company, payable with interest at such time as they saw fit, why would not that have been better for the contractor and better for them, being at the same time a compliance with the law?

A. Persons engaged in railroads generally think that if they can get the capital into stock it is the very best way in which they can have it, because then they are under no obligation to pay anything upon it unless they earn it, while if they have notes and bonds out they must either pay or go to protest.

Q. But that is in cases where the ownership of the capital and the ownership of the indebtedness are in different persons. In this case you proposed to have the ownership of the capital stock and the ownership of the indebtedness in the same persons, substantially, who were represented by those seven trustees.

Mr. OAKES AMES. If you will allow me I will say a word in answer to that. The stock would go into the hands of various parties; those trustees could not carry the notes, and when the notes got about into different hands, first one would sue and then another would sue.

Q. Were you not informed by the counsel who drew the contract that this was a violation of the law?

A. We were informed by counsel whom we consulted that this issuing of stock as a payment upon the contract for building the road was in entire compliance with the law.

Q. Who were the counsel that gave you that advice?

A. Mr. Charles Tracy, Mr. Samuel J. Tilden, and Judge Allen.

Q. All of New York?

A. All of New York. They were the parties that were consulted in this matter.

Q. Was this contract drawn before or after General Butler's visit to New York?

A. The Oakes Ames contract was before, and the assignment to the trustees was after.

Reform is needed, we are told, "to correct the omissions of a republican Congress and the errors of our treaties and diplomacy." Reform is always in order, and will be as long as humanity is aspiring and civilization advancing. Reform is simply growth, improvement, a change for the better. There can be no question as to the necessity of reform. It should be sought for at all times by individuals, States, and nations.

But who shall introduce it? How shall it be brought about? These are questions that people must answer for themselves, and no party can claim that it has a special monopoly in the field of reform. If a party persists in claiming that no other party can bring about reform, the people will naturally ask in what special instance has it shown peculiar fitness as a reformer. If this question should be asked the democratic party, what single instance could it cite that would satisfy the people that its claim was well founded? I know of none. The democratic platform opens with the assertion that it is demanded. The republican party has been practicing it for the past fifteen years.

Reform, we are told from the Saint Louis platform, is needed to rebuild and establish in the hearts of the whole people the Union. If this had read "rebuild and establish the Union in the democratic party" it would have been to the point. The Union was rebuilt years ago, and has been established as firm as a rock in the hearts of republicans throughout the land. Apply the reform spirit where it is needed, among those who have hated the Union and who still act as if their hatred continued, and the world will applaud this plank.

Reform is necessary, they say, "to establish a sound currency, restore the public credit, and maintain the national honor." If this democratic platform did not so state, no one would believe it. A sound currency? When was the people blessed with a sounder one? Who has lost a dollar by the bill of a broken national bank? The work of the counterfeiter has been almost destroyed; from Maine to California the people are familiar with the currency; imposition is almost impossible. The currency is sound, the soundest we ever had, and the republican party has paved the way, and, if not interfered with, hope to make it by 1879 as good as gold and the soundest currency in the world.

"Restore the public credit?" Why it never was lost. It stands high to-day in the markets of the world. It stands better than ever before in our history. No State governed by the democratic party can begin to compare with it in credit. Even the best State stocks of New York, a State governed by the man who has been selected to restore a credit that never was lost, fall below it; while the credit of the Southern States, sapped of their vitality by democratic misrule, has sunk so low that it almost causes a blush when we read the quotations. But the national credit stands high, thanks to the wisdom, the ability, the integrity of the republican party. Reform of the credit of the Government! Would that this same party now howling so lustily this battle-cry had practiced a little of what they profess in my own State, where they are and have been for years in power, and have dishonored her fair name by almost hopelessly ruining her credit, leaving her obligations unpaid, allowing her debt and interest thereon to accumulate until already some of their own reform party are threatening the eternal disgrace of the whole people of one of the noblest and proudest States in this Union by repudiation. They have paralyzed her energies, crippled her resources, manipulated her bonded debt in the interest of democratic cliques and rings until her bonds are now quoted at forty-four cents on the dollar, and still no preparations for reform can we see in the future.

Tennessee is not the only State in the South where the people have seen some of the beauties of democratic financial reform. The State of Texas is democratic in every department, and the San Antonio Herald is one of the leading democratic organs, and will not be suspected of falsehood or even of exaggeration. It says:

> In our Legislature the characteristic features are waste and extravagance. Offices are multiplied, salaries are increased, and the people's domain squandered in the most reckless manner; but the sacred trust, the school fund, amounting to $800,000, committed to their fiduciary care, is also violently seized and appropriated to the payment of mileage and per diem.

This, let it be it remembered, is done by the men who are clamorous for Tilden and his sort of reform. Nor is this the worst of the case. Under republican rule the State expenses were about $200,000; now they are nearly two millions. In its issue of July 8 the San Antonio Herald says boldly:

> Our State government is a curse and our laws are a mockery. By the apathy of the State government anarchy prevails and lawlessness and crime abound. The people must act in their own defense; the governor and Legislature will not.

Other instances of democratic reform of the same kind, where they have exercised full power, could be cited. It is enough to say these given are the rule and not the exception of the kind of democratic reform the States have enjoyed under democracy. In order to show that this cry of "reform in our national credit" is wholly for political effect, I will give the quotations of our national securities at the stock exchange in New York:

But they say also in their platform they want to come into power "to maintain the national honor." When did the national honor stand higher than to-day? Where is the nation, great or small, that does not respect the United States more to-day than ever before? England does; France does; Germany does; Russia does; all the great powers look up to us as never before in our career. If any disrespect has been shown our national honor, it has been by our own people, by the commission of lawless acts in the Southern States in defiance of national authority and the common pleadings of humanity.

With a sound currency, with good credit everywhere, and with a national honor equal to the most favored nation, how supremely foolish sound these partisan denunciations which were breathed at Saint Louis and put together and called a platform, denouncing as a failure what the people know to have been a success and what the historian will record as the grandest financial success of the century; denouncing as financial imbecility and party immorality a currency system which has made it possible for the nation to meet its heavy obligations without disturbing the business interests of a single community or trenching upon the rights of a single individual. If this system, which has given the nation a uniform currency, is the result of financial imbecility, what, I would ask in the name of reason, constitutes financial wisdom? But the eagerness of all classes, high and low, rich and poor, republicans and democrats, to secure a share of this currency and to hold fast to it when other values are gladly surrendered gives the lie to this charge and proves to my satisfaction that, no matter what is said in this platform, those who made it do not believe in the truth of what they uttered.

A sound currency, that we are all glad to get and sorry to part with; over $600,000,000 paid on the national debt; internal taxes reduced in amount from $309,226,813.42 in 1866 to $110,007,493.58 in 1875; our national securities higher than ever and sought after by the capitalists of the whole world, are items in the financial policy of the republican party that challenge the admiration of the American people. The Saint Louis denunciations are but empty sounds, devoid of truth and lacking the semblance of plausibility. The platform can scarcely be called a "declaration of principles," but would be better suited for a violent partisan campaign document, if it were not false in its statement of facts, false in its theories, and false in its conclusions; for even a campaign document ought to be true in all these respects.

While I am not among the older and more experienced members of this body, I have lived long enough to see the majority of the people in districts and States deluded as were "the children of Israel when God sent upon them a strong delusion that they might believe a lie." The masses in the Southern States could never have otherwise been led by their political orators and newspapers into rebellion; that the theories and principles which they taught were fallacious, and the hopes they inspired were a delusion and a fraud, no one can now deny.

Only two years ago democratic orators made themselves hoarse and democratic newspapers were frantic at the untold and unceasing miseries that would be forever entailed upon the American people should the "civil-rights bill" become a law. In many sections of the country the public mind was excited. The vivid pictures so artfully drawn of the great national calamities to follow the passage of that measure deceived many honest men, and to this fraud and delusion many gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber are permitted to hold their seats in this House to-day. The bill did become a law. Who has felt any of the fearful evils so vividly pictured? And now, having gained a majority in one House of Congress by deluding and deceiving the people upon false issues, false in fact, false in theory, and false in conclusions, they renew their efforts to manufacture other material of the same character for the coming campaign. Unable or unwilling to go into the contest on issues which are real, tangible, pertinent to the public interests, needing discussion and future action by whatever party shall be in power, they have gone vigorously to work and have wasted months of this session of Congress, prolonged the session, and spent nearly half a million dollars of the people's money in endeavoring to find a slender pretense on the evidence of witnesses many of whom would not be believed in a court of justice to charge extravagance upon the republican party and corruption on its favorite leaders. They hope again by such tactics to delude and deceive enough of the people to control the elections by an unceasing howl of extravagance and corruption, by wholesale slander against republican officials, and then with unblushing impudence present democracy as a reform party, and a Tammany-hall leader, the former colleague of Tweed & Co. and the attorney and adviser of Credit Mobilier swindles, as the great reformer of the age. But to return to their platform.

Reform is necessary to secure the resumption of specie payments, is it? I think not; for the day has been already decided upon, and no claim has yet been made that it is too far off. Can democracy secure it sooner? It makes no such pretension. It simply denounces the republican party for taking no steps in that direction, and yet with its usual consistency demands the immediate repeal of the only practical measure that it has taken. In other words, it condemns it for not doing a certain thing and then denounces it for doing that very thing. Well may we exclaim, "Humbug, thy name is democratic reform!"

Reform is necessary to secure a better system of finance than we now enjoy. What is this better system? Can any one tell? The platform of the democratic party is not very explicit. It says in the language of a Chesterfield and the ambiguity of the Chinese tongue:

> We believe such a system, well devised and above all intrusted to competent hands for execution, creating at no time an artificial scarcity of currency and at no time alarming the public mind into a withdrawal of that vaster machinery of credit by which 95 per cent. of all business transactions are performed, a system open to the public and inspiring general confidence, would from the day of its adoption bring healing on its wings to all our paralyzed industry, set in motion the wheels of commerce, manufactures, and other mechanic arts, and renew in all its natural sources the prosperity of the people.

This is all very pleasing, but what is this system that is to bring healing on its wings to all our paralyzed industry, set in motion the wheels of commerce, manufactures, and other mechanic arts, and renew in all its natural sources the prosperity of the people? Why has it not been brought forward by the majority of this House? Is it to be kept a profound secret? Have letters-patent been applied for or a caveat filed to protect the inventor? Let us have it now, for if it is all that is claimed for it, there will be no "dead lock" on its passage. Come, O system of Utopian promise! come with healing on your wings! Is there a democrat on this floor who can refuse this splendid opportunity to immortalize his name by introducing this magical system, born of the angels but now unfortunately under the especial guardianship of the democratic party? There is no such system, and none know it better than the very gentlemen who penned those brilliant, worthless promises. If I am wrong in the statement, will the democratic Committee on Banking and Currency tell us what this system is? If it is known it can be described. If it cannot be described, then it is not worth the language thrown away upon it. If it stands to finance as the Keeley motor does to mechanics, then let us know all about it or cease to further humbug the public.

We are told that reform is needed "in the aim and mode" of Federal taxation. The aim of Federal taxation is to secure money enough to pay the expenses of the Government. Is not the aim a laudable one? Where can reform be applied to this? The mode of Federal taxation may be a fair question for debate, but the present mode is certainly not "a masterpiece of injustice," as it has been called. The people have recognized it as the best possible under the circumstances. It would be pleasing if it could be abolished without injury to the public interests, but it cannot be. The expenditures which have grown out of the rebellion must be met. Large revenues have become a necessity. No honest man would repudiate our national obligations. Therefore our internal-revenue tax must continue to be collected, though it may be possible to somewhat simplify the mode of collecting it. This I have endeavored to do, so that in sparsely populated sections of the country those who desire to manufacture spirits and raise tobacco on a small scale may be enabled to do so and avoid the harsh and rigorous provisions of the law made to control the immense establishments of other sections. But for eight months our democratic Committee of Ways and Means have been unable to reform, or to propose or agree to any measure which will reform, either the mode or the aim of collecting the internal-revenue taxes. If there is a better way, give it to the people. Bills are introduced and buried in the committee. Eight months is certainly long enough to devise some means, if any exist, in the mode of assessing and collecting internal-revenue taxes; either present us one or cease this cry of demagogism.

Again, we are told that reform is necessary in the scale of public expenses, Federal, State, and municipal, and to give force to this assertion we are told that "our Federal taxation has swollen from $60,000,000 gold in 1860 to $450,000,000 currency in 1870; our aggregate taxation from $154,000,000 gold in 1860 to $730,000,000 currency in 1870, or in one decade from less than $5 per head to more than $18 per head." I know nothing about the correctness of these figures, but I do know, and the democrats know, the cause of this large increase. It represents the price paid by the people for the Union. Is it worth the money expended? If it is, and I believe it is, then the burden imposed upon us should be borne cheerfully, and I have faith enough in the American people to believe that it will be.

But, Mr. Speaker, it provokes both a smile and a feeling of indignation to hear the charge made against the republican party by democracy that the expenses of the Government are increased and too great, that taxes are burdening the people, that there are too many clerks and employés in the Departments, and our wicked extravagance has brought it about. Do they think the memory of the American people is so short as to forget that the democratic party of the South entered into a four years' rebellion, and was aided and encouraged by many of their northern brethren who are co-operating with them to-day? Do they suppose the people do not know that billions of treasure was a part of the price we paid to preserve the union of the States and make this happy centennial rejoicing possible? Do they not know who laid these burdens that are so hard to bear on our shoulders? We pay to-day about ninety millions interest on the money we borrowed to put down the rebellion. We pay about thirty millions more in pensions to disabled Union soldiers, their widows and orphans; we pay many millions more to officers of the regular Army on the retired list; for the examination and payment of claims for supplies taken; increase of clerical force to regulate and preserve the enormous records accumulating from a four years' war with two millions of men on the rolls—all this growing directly out of the rebellion. Yet the men engaged in that rebellion and those in full sympathy with them then as now are loudest in bitter denunciation of the extravagance of the republican party; or, to quote the language of an able Senator, they tell us—

> You republicans did not conquer our rebellion quite as cheaply as you ought to have done; you have not handled taxation and the public debt and the other consequences growing out of our treason as well as you ought to have done. Therefore we are indignant about it. You ought to have done this business better; you ought to have whipped us at half the expense, and you did not. We propose to take the Government out of your hands and ourselves to settle with and deal with the consequences of our own crimes and blunders.

Municipal reform and economy are necessary. No one doubts it. The city of New York is an example of this need. What reform has democracy instituted there? It has had an undisputed field. What has it accomplished? It has increased the city debt from $36,000,000 in 1867 to over $132,000,000 in 1876. Yet there has been no war to carry on, no extraordinary expenses to meet. Is this the kind of reform democracy would bring to the nation? If it is, our national debt would be nearly $10,000,000,000 before the close of a single term of democratic control. If democracy has done better than this in any other city where it has had control, let us have the name of the city and the character of the reform established.

As for the practice of economy in public expenditures, I believe in it. The republican party practice it. But saving money does not always indicate economy. You may refuse to build a light-house where one is needed and thereby save a few thousands of dollars, but you inflict an injury on commerce and on humanity which cannot be calculated in dollars and cents. You may refuse to finish a public building and thereby keep a few thousands in the Treasury, but the work is needed and must some time be executed. You have simply postponed payment. There is no economy in that. You may cut down your appropriation bills several millions, but you risk a serious injury to the public service which you have no right to incur. You may stop public improvements, discharge mechanics and laborers, shut up factories and workshops engaged on public works, and may call this economy, but it is not economy. You have set an example for those who have money and ought to spend it to withhold expenditures, shut down on labor, and thus you have contributed to the general stagnation of business. Is this economy? You may call it economy, but the people next November will call it by its right name, political stupidity.

You may cut down the pay of the overworked and faithful letter-carriers, who serve the people early and late, through sunshine and storm, exposed to the fierce heat of summer and the extreme cold of winter, but this is not economy; it is legalized injustice, and will be so regarded when the people come to render their verdict.

You may reduce salaries established when democracy was in power, and then none too large, when gold was the currency of the land and when every article entering into household consumption was cheaper than now; but this is not economy, it is simply parsimony uncalled for by any exigency of the times and indefensible on any grounds except those of partisan warfare.

You may save a few thousands of dollars by withdrawing the fast mails, and might appear to save more by returning to the old stage-coach system of transportation, but you cripple the postal service, and entail a loss direct and indirect on every business man who values quick dispatch and to whom the very earliest information has become a vital necessity. You may call this economy, and may argue on this floor that it is, but when you return to your constituents you will discover that you have committed a blunder that cannot be excused or justified on any grounds of public necessity.

True economy consults public interests and may often be found in the increase rather than in the diminution of public expenditures. By refusing to appropriate sufficient money for the proper care of our navy-yards, arsenals, mints, custom-houses, and other public buildings that constantly need to be watched and repaired, you actually waste the public funds, for you entail upon subsequent years expenditures that would be unnecessary if a proper sum had been appropriated to care for and properly guard the property of the Government. The sailor who fails to stop a leak when he first sees it may discover when too late that his folly and neglect have cost him a ship.

It is not economy to refuse sufficient appropriations for the rivers and harbors scattered all over this broad land which can easily be made navigable by a reasonable expenditure, unless in the same bill you incorporate useless and reckless expenditures on "creeks that will not swim a duck," and where the engineers report that the first thing necessary is a steam-pump to pump up the water to start a river. And yet this is the character of economy we have seen practiced in this House where the democratic party is in power. I do not claim that republican legislation is perfect, that errors have not been committed; but I do claim that it stands ready to punish its dishonest officials, correct its errors, and that the American people can with far more confidence intrust the administration of this Government in its hands than to turn it over to democracy.

Again, we are told that reform is necessary in the civil service, and are further informed that—

> Experience proves that efficient economical conduct of the governmental business is not possible if its civil service be subject to change at every election, be a prize fought for at the ballot-box, be a brief reward of party zeal instead of a post of honor assigned for proved competency, and held for fidelity in the public employ.

Does democracy practice what it here preaches? Can it be claimed that the republican officials, many of them wounded ex-Federal soldiers, who were removed by the majority of this House, were less efficient than the democrats who were appointed to their places? If they were as efficient why were they removed? Everybody knows they were removed because they were republicans. Had they been democrats they would have been retained. I refer to the radical changes made in the employés of this House since democracy controlled it simply to show that the democratic Solons of Saint Louis differ very widely from the democratic Solomons here assembled, or Saint Louis was insincere in its pretensions. I prefer to believe the latter. for a close observation has convinced me that democracy is about the same everywhere; it believes in democracy, it surrounds itself with democracy, it makes war on anything or everything that appears hostile to democracy.

If offices should be held by men as a reward for competency, as a post of honor for fidelity in the public employ, why did the official ax decapitate men of tried ability and known integrity in this House? Why was it used so fiercely when Tilden replaced John A. Dix, and swept the State of New York of republican officials? Why is it that in every State, county, town, or city where democracy controls the appointments that none but democrats are found in office? The answer is plain. It is simply because it is the policy of the party to surround itself by its friends; and in the full glare of this policy the reform alluded to in the Saint Louis platform seems to be as much out of place as a prayer meeting would be in Tammany Hall. Again allow me to exclaim, "Humbug. thy name is democratic reform."

There may be abuses which have crept into the civil service, but these can be corrected without destroying the party that has built up a civil service which is as honorable and as efficient as any in the world. To say that "the first step in reform must be the people's choice of honest men from another party," is to say that the only way to stop a leak is to destroy the ship and build another; or, to make an illustration more applicable, to destroy a vessel that is known to be staunch and sea-worthy and to replace it with one that is believed to be worm-eaten below the water-line andbadly damaged above, and likely to go to pieces with the first blast of the elements.

Yes, reform is necessary, and always will be until the end of time; but how is it to be brought about? Our plan is to select the very best men in the republican party, point out where reform is needed, and let them do the work, and bring to swift and certain punishment all dishonest officials. What is the democratic plan? We have it announced in the platform. "Reform can only be had," says this oracular piece of timber, "by a peaceful, civil revolution." Ominous words. The last attempt of a large portion of this same party at revolution was not "peaceful," though that promised in the beginning it would be. It failed; and now the same portion is to try the virtues of a peaceful revolution. Will it succeed? First let us ask, should it? Is there anything in the present condition of public affairs that would justify a revolution of any kind, peaceful or otherwise?

Our national policy is a good one. Our foreign relations are satisfactory. We are in the enjoyment of peace abroad and, with the exception of our Indian troubles, peace at home. Democracy asks for support on the grounds that it has accepted the results of the war and the amendments of the Constitution as binding. If this is so, why the necessity of a revolution to bring out reform, when every measure of the republican party is in exact accord with the changed condition incident to these results and amendments? What is the meaning of revolution? It is something more than a change for the better, it is a complete overthrow of existing affairs, and whether it comes in the shape of politics or war it leaves in its track a desolation that can only be justified by the plea that it was the last resort of an oppressed people. Webster says in defining the term, "a revolution in politics is the consummation of a rebellion or revolt against the established or existing government." Is this "peaceful revolution" which the democratic platform tells us is the only means whereby reform can be brought about "the consummation of a rebellion or revolt against the established or existing government?" If it is, then indeed the people should be informed of its character, and forewarned that its object is to secure by peaceful revolution what an armed rebellion failed to secure by the sword. If it is to be a revolt against the established Government, under the cover of politics, who that loves his country can hesitate in deciding on which side he belongs?

If the price to be paid for democratic reform is revolution, even though it be peaceful, the people will have none of it, but will reject it as they did the reform which was proclaimed in the bugle-blasts of war and in the tread of mighty columns armed to enforce it.

Revolution is distasteful in any form to the American people. Whether peaceful or warlike they will accept it only as a last resort. That contingency has not yet arrived, nor will it as long as patriotism and loyalty remain in power. I have an abiding faith in the good sense of the majority, and I feel assured that whatever reform is to be brought about will be inaugurated by the party that has defended the nation in its hour of trial and guided it with unparalleled wisdom through eleven years of peace.

The voice of the people will be heard in November through the ballot-box, not calling democracy into power, but in a full, hearty indorsement of the republican party and the patriotic work that it has performed. The ballot has not yet failed us, and never will as long as patriotism, loyalty, and integrity are the ruling elements in the land. On the ballot we rely for the vindication of our work and the purity of our motives. It is the true reformer that brings about improvement without revolution and corrects all wrongs without exciting rebellion or revolt. When its voice, denouncing democracy and sham reform, shall be heard, the revolutionists of the land will be forced to acknowledge that—

> There is a weapon surer yet
> And stronger than the bayonet;
> A weapon that comes down as still
> As snow-flakes fall upon the sod;
> But executes a freeman's will
> As lightning does the will of God.

Pacific Railroads.

SPEECH OF HON. W. S. HOLMAN,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 7, 1876.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3672) to amend the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," and other acts in relation to the railroad companies therein named—

Mr. HOLMAN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The House is anxious to dispose of this bill, and I shall content myself in the main by expressing my unqualified approval of the objects of this measure. The discussion of this bill by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] does not rise, it seems to me, to the magnitude of this question. This is not a question between the Government of the United States and a mere private corporation; the question presented is not analogous to that arising upon a supposed contract between the government of a State and a corporation organized under its laws for the promotion of private or even public objects, or for business purposes and private gain; but it is a question of high public and national policy, directly affecting the affairs of the National Government, not simply in a financial view, but in the higher view of public agencies and the efficiency of government. Perhaps, having heard this subject discussed in 1862 in and out of this Hall when the original bill passed, and in the still more animated and practical discussion of 1864, when the important enlargement of the measure was carried, my views may be greatly influenced by the opinions then expressed. But gentlemen must see from the nature of the measure and the magnitude of the Government subsidy that Congress in legislating upon this subject considered the construction of the Pacific Railroad as a great public and political measure. The railroad was to be constructed as an agency of the Government, and although to be largely under private control it was in its original object and purpose as much a concern of Government as if constructed under one of the Bureaus of the Departments. In the origin of the measure, in the creation of these corporations, and in the vast subsidies of lands and bonds, governmental and national objects only were primarily considered; the closer union of the States of the Atlantic and Pacific, then a measure of vital moment, and not the speculation and private gain of the corporators. These great powers, it is true, were ultimately employed through corrupt agencies for mere private gain, but the original purpose was national. The Pacific railroad system was in no sense a private enterprise for individual profit, but a measure of public policy for the nation.

The whole question is involved in the sixth section of the original act declaring the conditions upon which this corporation should be created and the object to be accomplished, and in the repealing clause in the eighteenth section of the original act. These two provisions taken together indicate the exact purpose of Congress and the exact relations which the Government occupies toward these great corporations, which were being created for high political purposes. The sixth section to which I refer, the sixth section of the original act, reads as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the grants aforesaid are made upon condition that said company shall pay said bonds at maturity, and shall keep said railroad and telegraph line in repair and use, and shall at all times transmit dispatches over said telegraph line, and transport mails, troops, and munitions of war, supplies, and public stores upon said railroad for the Government whenever required to do so by any Department thereof, and that the Government shall at all times have the preference in the use of the same for all the purposes aforesaid, (at fair and reasonable rates of compensation not to exceed the amounts paid by private parties for the same kind of service;) and all compensation for services rendered for the Government shall be applied to the payment of said bonds and interest until the whole amount is fully paid. Said company may also pay the United States wholly or in part in the same or other bonds, Treasury notes, or other evidences of debt against the United States, to be allowed at par. And after said road is completed, until said bonds and interest are paid, at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings of said road shall also be annually applied in the payment thereof.

The purpose of this great enterprise is too manifest for argument: the creation of facilities for national intercourse and for the employment of national powers.

It was an agency of the Government, and not a private corporation or a series of private corporations for the purposes of individual gain. The railroads to be constructed were to be agents of the Government and the corporations then being created were but instruments to that end. I now read the repealing clause of the 18th section of the original act:

And the better to accomplish the object of this act, namely to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times (but particularly in time of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, Congress may, at any time, having due regard for the rights of said companies named herein, add to, alter, and amend or repeal this act.

I think this clause, more clearly than even the sixth section of the act, indicates the character of this railroad system, the purposes of the Government, and the design of the law.

To accomplish the object of the act, "namely, to promote the public interest and welfare," and to secure to the Government at all times, and particularly in time of war, the use of this railroad and telegraph "for postal, military, and other purposes," to secure these objects Congress may at any time, having due regard to the rights of said companies, "add to, alter, and amend or repeal this act."

Can any judicial mind reading these two provisions deny that these corporations were simply designed to be subordinate agents of the Government? The Dartmouth College case could not possibly apply to this act and to these corporations even if the constitutional limitation as to impairing the validity of contracts applied to the Federal Government as well as to States. But it does so apply for the most obvious reason, that no people in the exercise of their most absolute sovereignty as expressed in their government could consent to such a limitation. Every inevitable change in the measure of values might impair the validity of contracts, the exigencies of a government might involve the most serious perils fatal to national existence if such a limitation, proper as to the local government of a State, was applied to the collective States as a nation. It could not be assumed that the whole people in the expression of the highest attributes of sovereignty as a government—a nation—equally affecting all, could be unwise and unjust. For that reason this limitation as to the obligation of contracts was not imposed upon the Federal Government by the Constitution, although it was expressly imposed by the Constitution upon the several States. The Federal Government has time and time again impaired indirectly the obligation of contracts, and the emergency fully justified it. These roads were constructed as agents of the Government, to be used by the Government in time of peace for postal services and in time of war for the transportation of military supplies and of military forces. It was for this reason that the system received the fostering care of the Government—was brought into life by the Government. Congress must determine in what emergency the act creating these corporations shall be altered or amended. It is of the first importance to the Government that these corporations shall be kept solvent, and instead of their contracting and carrying vast liabilities which will ultimately greatly embarrass their fulfillment of their obligation to the Government in peace and in war, that such liabilities should be liquidated from time to time as their revenues shall justify, instead of these revenues being withdrawn to promote the private fortunes of the corporators and permitting the liabilities to accumulate year after year, and then crushing down by their weight the corporations and rendering them unable at least for the time to meet the requirements of the Government.

In other words, it is to the interest of the Government that these corporations should be able without interruption to perform the service for the Government for which they were organized. With ample revenues it is clearly in harmony with the rights of these corporations and their obligations to the Government that the debt due to the Government, and by which in fact these great roads were created, should be provided for year by year out of their earnings, so that they may be able to promptly fulfill at the end of the thirty years their engagement "to pay said bonds at maturity." And it is clear that if these bonds are paid at maturity, which of course involves the payment of the interest and principal, a sinking fund must be provided for, else, as indicated during the last few years, these great railroads built by the munificence of the Government, instead of remaining under the control of solvent corporations, will simply furnish vast facilities for a succession of skillful and unscrupulous managers to build up imperial fortunes, and at the end of the thirty years, or long before that time, to permit the corporations to become hopelessly insolvent and secure the sale of their respective roads under the first mortgage, which by the dishonest management of the incipient Credit Mobilier, in 1864, on this floor secured the priority and the postponement of the Government lien for the means by which the roads were to be and were built.

By the act of 1864 amendatory of the act of 1862, and under which the Credit Mobilier was organized and the Union Pacific Railroad and the other roads were constructed, three important changes were made in the act of 1862, but neither of them affects the general purpose of the original act. First, the lien of the Government was postponed in favor of the mortgages of the companies for an amount equal to the Government bond subsidy; second, the Government was to retain only one-half of the sums that should accrue to the companies for the transportation of troops and supplies and the like, to be applied upon the debt that should be due to the Government for bonds and interest, and should pay the other half over to the companies. The effect of these two provisions was, in fact, to double the subsidy and diminish by one-half the means by which the Government should be re-imbursed; and, third, a general right of repeal. The last section of the act of July 2, 1864, is as follows:

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

From my view, this general power to "alter, amend, or repeal" the act does not change or enlarge the power retained by Congress under the original act of 1862. Under either act the rights of the companies as well as of the Government, and the nature and purpose of these corporations, are to be considered in determining what amendments or alterations are just and proper. What then is the state of the case? These companies are indebted to the Government for the means by which the roads were built and equipped, and for interest paid by the United States on the bonds issued, as per the following statement which I clip from the public-debt statement of June 30, 1876:

Bonds issued to the Pacific railway companies.

[Rate of interest 6 per cent., payable January and July.]

Name of railway.	Principal outstanding.	Interest repaid by transportation of mails, &c.	Balance of interest paid by the United States.
Central Pacific	$25,885,120 00	$1,231,213 76	$10,573,037 51
Kansas Pacific	6,303,000 00	1,448,327 39	1,844,655 70
Union Pacific	27,236,512 00	4,079,704 77	8,621,715 24
Central Branch, Union Pacific	1,600,000 00	44,408 05	785,400 21
Western Pacific	1,970,560 00	9,367 00	772,129 94
Sioux City and Pacific	1,628,320 00	39,470 28	692,083 21
Totals	64,623,512 00	6,852,491 25	23,289,021 81

These bonds were issued under the acts of 1862 and 1864, are payable thirty years from date. The whole interest paid by the United States is $30,141,513.06. The companies have repaid to the United States by the transportation of mails, &c., the sum of $6,852,491.25, leaving still due to the United States the sum of $23,289,021.81.

So the Government has subsidized these companies up to this date as follows:

Bonds issued	$64,623,512 00
Interest paid on these bonds and not refunded	23,289,021 81
Total	87,912,533 81

To which should be added the land subsidy of 30,931,766 acres, a territory nearly one-third larger than the great State of Indiana, which I have in part the honor to represent. This is the imperial possession which these companies have obtained from the Government, to say nothing of the exorbitant charges made for the transportation of troops and supplies, one-half of which, by the extraordinary decision of the Supreme Court, they are able to extort annually from the public Treasury, notwithstanding they are indebted to the Government $23,289,021.81 for interest advanced on their bonds.

The net earnings of these companies, so far as reported to Congress, for the last year were as follows:

Union Pacific	$6,148,365 67
Central Pacific	8,031,498 13
Kansas Pacific	1,212,722 63
Sioux City and Pacific	210,220 66
Total	15,602,807 09

And thus the few enterprising gentlemen, mostly stock-brokers of New York City, who corrupted Congress, secured the passage of the act of 1864, organized the Credit Mobilier—through which, by direct fraud, in which many public men were induced to participate, a gain to dishonesty and a loss to the people of the vast sum of $43,925,328.34 occurred—are permitted to divide among themselves, after paying all the expenses, the sum of $15,602,807.09 annually, while the labor of the country pays the interest on the very bonds out of which their enormous profits flow and is running a great risk of ultimately paying the bonds.

And what is now proposed by this bill? Simply that these companies shall pay into the national Treasury annually a sum which in the aggregate will approximate to the amount that will be due upon the principal of the bonds and interest paid by the Government at the end of the thirty years. I say approximate, for the sums required to be paid annually will not fully meet the debt.

The provision in the sixth section of the original act, which I have quoted, requiring the companies to pay annually at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings of the roads on the bonded indebtedness, is wholly insufficient to protect the Government. What the net earnings shall be is a matter within the control of the companies. The corporators by exhaustive salaries and special contracts can make these net earnings a mere bagatelle. Something far more effective than this is required. I think that that clause requiring the companies to pay at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings annually, coupled with the general power of amendments in the eighteenth section, make it very clear that the amendment proposed by the pending bill providing for a sinking fund is in perfect harmony with the laws under which these roads were constructed.

The case is very clear. Congress must either intercept annually a portion of the net earnings of these corporations and put it into the Treasury, or at the end of the thirty years a debt of at least $160,000,000, after all deductions, will rest upon these companies, independent of the prior-lien mortgages for $64,623,512, and the successive armies of skillful and artful lobbyists will have retired with imperial fortunes; and besides the loss of over thirty million acres of the just heritage of labor, that same labor will bear the loss of the $160,000,000. It must be borne in mind that the prior mortgage of $64,623,512 will still remain unpaid, and it is manifest that if the Government does not anticipate the state of this indebtedness prior to the expiration of the thirty years by some measure at least as effective as that proposed by this bill, the Government will pay the bonds and interest, without the possibility of its being refunded. Our experience with these corporations renders this absolutely certain, unless the whole policy of the Government shall be changed.

I trust, sir, that this measure will pass this House with such a degree of unanimity as will secure its further prompt and effective consideration until it shall become a law. The measure is eminently just and proper. No refined technicalities should be allowed to defeat it. The Dartmouth College doctrine of vested rights can have no application here, and if it could the history of this Union Pacific Railroad and its associate lines and branches, the fraud in which the act of 1864 was conceived, the venality it inspired even in this Hall, the wrenching of parliamentary law to subserve its purposes, and the subversion of honest legislation to the revolting cupidity of the lobby which it inspired, and the long line of measures that followed it in which the very fountains of the law were polluted and Government became but an instrument of personal and dishonest gain, tell too plainly to the American people that that doctrine, while well enough as an abstraction and as applied to a particular case, cannot be adhered to as a final maxim of law unless it is conceded that the most vital interest of the people shall be at the mercy of the venal and unscrupulous lobby which at times usurps the power of enacting laws.

This measure is subject to no such embarrassment. Its provisions are forbearing, reasonable, and just, and it will become a law unless the power of these corporations is stronger than the sense of justice in the American Congress.

Subsidiary Silver Coin.

SPEECH OF HON. A. CAMPBELL,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 13, 1876,

On the conference report relative to the issue of subsidiary silver coin.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, in whatever phase this currency question is presented it is sure to take a wide range, embracing in its scope the whole subject of money and payment of the public debt. Judging from the arguments advanced by all parties to the controversy, it would seem that as to the end, they were agreed. All profess to be in favor of honest money and honest payment of the debt in accordance with the letter and spirit of the laws under which it was contracted. But upon the question of what is honest money and what constitutes honest payment of the public debt, they differ as wide as the poles.

Assuming both parties to this controversy to be sincere in their professions of honesty and honor and the maintenance of the public faith inviolate, the opposite conclusions at which they arrive as to the nature of the obligation, what constitutes honest payment of the public debt, and maintenance of national honor, can only be accounted for by a different interpretation of the laws under which the debt was contracted. As this disagreement can only be settled by reference to the laws under which the debt was created, I will present in brief the acts and parts of acts as to which there is a difference of opinion between the parties.

By the act of February 25, 1862, the issue of $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes was authorized, which were made receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin, and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid.

By the act of July 11, 1862, there was again an issue authorized of $150,000,000, receivable in payment for all loans made to the United States, and of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States except duties on imports and interest, and of all claims and demands against the United States except for interest upon bonds, notes, and certificates of debt or deposit, and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid.

By the act of March 3, 1863, a third issue was authorized of $150,000,000, which notes so issued, says the act, "shall be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States except for duties on imports and interest on the public debt."

The following is the act of March 18, 1869:

Be it enacted, &c., That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the law by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of said obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver. But none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin.

And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

Section 13 of an act approved February 12, 1873, provides—

That the standard for both gold and silver coins of the United States shall be such that of one thousand parts by weight nine hundred shall be of pure metal and one hundred of alloy.

Section 14 of the same act provides—

That gold coins of the United States shall be a one-dollar piece, which, at the standard weight of 25.8 grains, shall be the unit of value; a quarter eagle, or two-and-a-half-dollar piece; a three-dollar piece; a half eagle, or five-dollar piece; an eagle, or ten-dollar piece; a double eagle, or twenty-dollar piece. And the standard weight of the gold dollar shall be 25.8 grains; of the quarter eagle, or two-and-a-half-dollar piece, 64½ grains; of the three-dollar piece, 77.4 grains; of the half eagle, or five-dollar piece, 129 grains; of the eagle, or ten-dollar piece, 258 grains; of the double eagle, or twenty-dollar piece, 516 grains; which coins shall be a legal tender in all payments at their nominal value when not below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided in this act.

Section 15 of the same act is as follows:

That the silver coins of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, a half dollar, or fifty-cent piece; a quarter dollar, or twenty-five-cent piece; a dime, or ten-cent piece; and the weight of the trade-dollar shall be 420 grains troy; the weight of the half dollar shall be twelve grams and one-half of a gram; the quarter dollar and the dime shall be respectively one-half and one-fifth of the weight of said half dollar; and said coins shall be a legal tender, at their nominal value, for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

Section 17, same act, reads:

That no coins, either of gold, silver, or minor coinage, shall hereafter be issued from the Mint other than those of the denominations, standards, and weights herein set forth.

REFUNDING OF THE NATIONAL DEBT.

By the act of July 14, 1870—

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue $200,000,000 in coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, and of denominations of $50 or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value, at the pleasure of the United States, after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest semi-annually in coin at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum; also a sum or sums not exceeding in the aggregate $300,000,000 of like bonds, the same in all respects, but payable at the pleasure of the United States after fifteen years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum; also a sum or sums not exceeding in the aggregate $1,000,000,000 of like bonds, the same in all respects, but payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum; all of which said several classes of bonds and the interest thereon shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority; and the said bonds shall have set forth and expressed upon their face the above specified conditions, and shall, with their coupons, be made payable at the Treasury of the United States.

THE RESUMPTION ACT.

The latter part of the resumption act reads:

And whenever and so often as circulating notes shall be issued to any such banking association, so increasing its capital or circulating notes, or so newly organized as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the legal-tender United States notes in excess only of $300,000,000, to the amount of 80 per cent. of the sum of national-bank notes so issued to any such banking association as aforesaid, and to continue such redemption as such circulating notes are issued until there shall be outstanding the sum of $300,000,000 of such legal-tender United States notes, and no more. And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding, on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York in sums of not less than $50. And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues from time to time in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid.

The foregoing are all the acts or parts of acts in relation to the currency and debt about which there is, or has been, any dispute. It will be seen that the language in relation to the legal-tender quality of the United States notes or legal-tender currency is the same in all the laws authorizing their issue, namely: That they should be receivable in payment of all demands due the United States, except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except for interest upon bonds and notes which shall be paid in coin, and shall also be lawful money and a legal-tender in payment of all debts public and private within the United States, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt.

There would then seem to be no room for reasonable doubt that the intention of the Congress that passed these acts was, that the principal of the 5.20 bonds was payable in the legal-tenders or the lawful money with which they were purchased. The language is clear and unequivocal, and will, I think, admit of no other construction. If it had been otherwise intended, it would have been very easy, and the makers of the laws would have undoubtedly excepted the principal as well as the interest of the debt, by saying except the interest and principal of the national debt.

The only question in controversy prior to the passage of the act of March 18, 1869, was as to whether the principal of the 5.20 bonds was payable or redeemable in lawful money, at the pleasure of the Government, after five years from the date of their issue, or whether they were payable in coin. The question as to whether payment was to be made in gold or silver coin was not then raised. Here again, if Congress had intended that payment should be made in gold, it would have been natural and eminently proper to have inserted "gold coin" instead of "coin." I believe the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was in Congress when this law was passed, and if, as he now says, gold coin only was intended, I can but regard it as exceedingly strange that a gentleman of his legislative experience and quickness of apprehension, and whose retrospective vision now seems so clear, should have failed to supply this important omission.

But the gentleman says:

After all the doubt and turbulent excitement about what the actual obligation of the nation was in regard to the public debt, the first act of Congress approved by President Grant made a solemn declaration designed to put all those doubts to rest. It was declared by Congress that "the faith of the nation is solemnly pledged to the payment"—in what? Not in silver, not in gold, not in coin, but "in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver."

The gentleman asks, with a seeming air of triumph, "Now, what did Congress mean?" I reply by repeating that the only controversy up to the time of the passage of the act of 1869 was as to whether the principal of the 5-20 bonds was payable in legal tenders or the lawful money with which they were purchased or in coin; not in gold coin, not in silver coin, but "coin;" and that manifestly the intention of Congress was to put all doubts on this point to rest by changing the character of the main portion of the public debt from currency to coin by enacting that a debt that was legally, equitably, and morally payable in the lawful money with which the securities were purchased should be paid in coin, thereby imposing an unjust burden of from three hundred to five hundred million dollars on the tax-paying portion of the people of the nation for the benefit of the few usurers, money-mongers, and gold-gamblers.

But the gentleman proceeds to say that—

Since 1834 we have had one standard dollar, and we have embodied it in two metals, gold and silver. * * * Every hour that we had a double standard it was double only on the ground of equivalency, and when, by reason of the shifting value of the two metals in reference to each other, the silver dollar and the gold dollar have varied from each other in value, Congress has undertaken to equalize them by increasing the amount of metal in one or decreasing the amount of metal in the other.

This application of the principle of "equivalency" is certainly original with the gentleman from Ohio. I do not believe any one can be found to dispute his right to letters-patent on it. But if the gentleman is to be credited with sincerity it must be admitted that his memory of facts is greatly at fault; for the silver dollar of 371¼ grains troy of pure silver was the unit of value and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, for any amount whatsoever, from 1792 until the passage of the infamous act of 1873. Any change made in the quantity of the metal in the dollars to keep them of equal value was made in the gold dollar, and not in the silver dollar. If, then, this principle of equivalency is to be adopted I submit that in all fairness, equity, and good conscience it should be done by diminishing the quantity of metal in the gold dollar, so as to keep it of equal value with the silver dollar. I do not, however, ask that this change be made, but I do insist that to keep faith with all parties, the debtor class, as well as the creditor class, demands the restoration of the standard of value in existence when the debt was contracted.

Again the gentleman from Ohio says:

When Congress promised to pay coin it was a promise to pay gold coin or silver coin of equal value to the same nominal sum in gold.

And adds:

I cannot believe that this will be denied.

By what principle of political ethics or moral honesty the gentleman reaches this conclusion, knowing as he does that when the law was passed, when the promise was made, the silver dollar was the unit of value and the legal dollar of the realm, is incomprehensible to the common mind.

I venture to say that the gentleman cannot find one disinterested, fair-minded man in fifty who has examined this subject with any degree of care that will agree with him that the language of the act of 1869 will bear the construction he now puts upon it, or that, if we had been so fortunate as to have discovered a bonanza of gold instead of silver, his eloquent voice, as well as that of all the retainers of the money-mongers "at home and abroad," would not have been heard in favor of retaining the silver standard.

Again, the gentleman from Ohio says:

Congress saw a few years ago that it was going to be difficult to keep up the equality or equivalency of the dollar in the two metals; so it dropped one of the metals except as a subsidiary coin, and left the national standard of value embodied in the other, namely, in gold.

The gentleman is certainly mistaken when he says "Congress saw," for the facts connected with the passage of the law demonetizing the silver dollar and making the gold dollar the unit of value show that, outside of the committee having charge of the subject and a few interested parties, Congress had no opportunity to examine or to know what was in the bill. Sir, it was the bankers, usurers, and money-lending class generally, both at home and abroad, that saw a "notable opportunity" of committing a grand swindle on the tax-payers and debtor class generally, which they were not slow to embrace, and finding willing agents in Congress and other official positions they found but little difficulty in accomplishing their nefarious purpose.

By reference to the extracts from the law of February 12, 1873, printed herewith, it will be seen how cunningly the change from the silver standard to the gold standard was effected. In one section the gold dollar of 25.8 grains is made the unit of value. In the next section where the silver coins are enumerated, the legal dollar of 412½ grains is omitted, and the silver coins made a legal tender for $5. Then in another section it is provided that no coins either of gold or silver shall thereafter be issued from the Mint other than those of the denominations, standards, and weights therein set forth.

The bill by which this infamous swindle was perpetrated containing sixty-seven sections and covering over twelve pages of fine printed matter, was reported in the form of a substitute from the Committee on Mints and Coinage by Mr. Hooper, of Massachusetts, and passed under a suspension of the rules without being printed. Indeed, it is not clear from the record that the substitute was even read at length at the Clerk's desk. The vote by which it was passed shows 110 in the affirmative and 13 in the negative, being a bare quorum. The House was then composed of two hundred and forty-six members, of whom one hundred and twenty-three, or one-half of the whole number, did not vote on the passage of the bill, but the absent members probably knew just as much about its provisions as most of those who voted for it.

Mr. Hooper, of Massachusetts, who reported the substitute, asked that the rules be suspended and the bill passed without reading. He said:

I desire to call up bill (H. R. No. 1427) revising and amending the laws relative to mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States. I do so for the purpose of offering an amendment in the nature of a substitute, one which has been very carefully prepared and which I have submitted to the different gentlemen in this House who had taken a special interest in the bill. I find that it meets with universal approbation in the form in which it is offered. I move that the rules be suspended and the substitute be put on its passage.

Sir, it will thus be seen that in all the proceeding had upon the substitute in the House there was no opportunity for examination or discussion, and outside of the few initiated in the mystery of iniquity contemplated by the bill it is not probable that 1 in 50 of those who voted for it had any knowledge of its provisions or the remotest idea that the design of its authors was to consummate the most perfidious act connected with all our financial legislation. Yet the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has the assurance to tell us that Congress saw the difficulty of keeping up the "equivalency" in the two metals, so it dropped one, and that one which had been the unit of values from the earliest organization of the Government and upon the basis of which every debt, public and private, in the nation had been contracted, and adopted the one in the interest of the mere usurers and money-mongers at home and abroad.

Sir, I feel confident that any impartial man who will take the trouble to investigate the circumstances connected with the passage of this act and its ruinous effects upon the industrial interest of the nation will not fail to arrive at the conclusion that it was inspired by the money lords of Europe who purchased our securities, both public and private, at discounts sufficiently great to afford a large profit even should those debts be discharged in lawful money with gold at double the premium it now commands, and that it was dictated to Congress by their allies in Wall street and other money centers at home.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] says:

Now the fact that in 1873 we adopted a device to preserve the constancy of the value of the dollar does not by any means signify that we meant to change the old obligation so that men to whom the Government owes money can lawfully be paid in money of a different value.

Sir, if it was not intended to pay the Government creditors as well as all other creditors in money of greater value than that of the legal standard when the debts were contracted, then there certainly was no necessity for demonetizing silver. But the gentleman will find it difficult to convince the dullest intellect that the demonetization of one-half of the coin of the nation will not enhance the value of the other half. If he does not know that this infamous law which he helped to enact and which he now defends with such thinly disguised sophistry and so much seeming earnestness was a "device" to increase the value of gold, and consequently the value of all debts, public and private, he is ignorant alike of the intention and purpose of its real authors, the usurers and money-mongers, and the practical effect of its workings on the industrial interests and legitimate business of the country.

The gentleman says:

Some one has said there is an innate desire in the human mind to get a chance to cheat somebody.

Sir, if somebody had never uttered this sentence the passage of the law demonetizing silver, and other kindred acts relating to the finances and currency of the nation, with which the gentleman ought to be familiar, afford a practical demonstration of the fact that there existed in the minds of their authors a desire to "cheat somebody," and that somebody those who had confided their interest to their keeping.

Again the gentleman says:

A great minister once said that there are two things in human nature which when united always made iniquity complete; one was the desire to do a dishonorable thing and the other was the opportunity to do it.

And he adds that—

It has so happened in the fluctuations of these metals that there is now a notable opportunity to cheat several millions of men by adopting the baser metal as the standard of payment, and thus to accomplish a swindle on so grand a scale as to make the achievement illustrious.

Sir, unfortunately for the wealth-producing and tax-paying portion of the American people the two things in human nature necessary to make iniquity complete were united in the authors of the law changing the standard of payment from silver, which had been the unit of values from the organization of the Government, to gold. They had the desire and thus created and embraced the opportunity to make manifest their disposition and capacity to "make iniquity complete" by covertly and stealthily perpetrating a swindle on so grand a scale as to make it illustriously infamous among all the corrupt legislation in the past history of the nation.

Sir, I tell the gentleman and those who hold with him, that the sober second thought, the calm and deliberate judgment of the American people, will be that it was the change effected by the law of 1873 and not, as he says, by the proposition to restore the standard of payment in existence when the debt was contracted that "a swindle on so grand a scale as to make the achievement illustrious" was accomplished.

Sir, I deny that the amendment which proposes to restore the standard of payment in existence when all of the national debt and most of the private debts were contracted is either a dishonorable or dishonest act. On the contrary, I insist that it contemplates no cheating or swindling of any class, and that it is an act of good faith founded on the principles of sound morality and good conscience. On the other hand I charge that the measure the gentleman and those who agree with him advocate with so much ability and seeming earnestness is, to characterize it mildly, an act of bad faith and of doubtful morality. It is not an act to cheat a few millions of men out of a thousand or so millions of dollars, but an act to "at one fell stroke" deprive the whole industrial and tax-paying portion of the American people of their God-given right to enjoy the fruits of their labor and talents, to reduce them to a state of practical serfdom for all time for the benefit of a few avaricious usurers at home and abroad.

This is the kind of legislation that the advocates of this and other cunning fiscal contrivances for the oppression and degradation of the working classes call "honest." They can see no injustice or wrong in legislation that robs the industrial classes. It is only when an attempt is made to thwart some wicked scheme dictated by the money-lending class that their consciences are quickened and their moral sensibilities aroused. It would seem that their moral vision had become so darkened and their consciences so seared as to render them incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong.

Speaking in reference to the proposition to restore the silver dollar as the unit of values, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] said:

Since I have been in public life I have never known any proposition that contained so many of the essential elements of vast rascality, of colossal swindling, as this.

I have the charity to believe that the gentleman's memory was at fault when he uttered this sentence. I cannot believe that, with all his past experience in public life before his mind, he would have had the assurance to make a statement so clearly unsupported by the facts. The gentleman must surely have forgotten that he was in Congress when the salary grab and Credit Mobilier acts were passed, and it is difficult to believe that acts of this character could have got through Congress without the knowledge of a gentleman so sensitive on the subject of the public interest and national honor. It must also have escaped his memory that he was a member of the House when the national-banking swindle was created, and when the swindle to strengthen the public credit was enacted. By the former of these acts the whole money power of the nation was surrendered to a system of irresponsible corporations by which the people have already suffered a direct loss by way of interest on the bonds of over $350,000,000, and an indirect loss of double that amount by way of extortionate rates of interest. By the latter of these acts over $400,000,000 were added to the public debt by changing payment from currency to coin.

Not one of these acts can be defended on the principle of enlightened public policy or sound morality, while the measure that the gentleman condemns so vehemently is consistent with both, as well as with good faith and national honor.

But if all the dishonor and dishonesty; all the villainy and rascality contained in the above enumerated acts, were centered in one it would not contain half "so many of the essential elements of vast rascality, of colossal swindling," as the one the gentleman advocates so earnestly.

Neither this nor any of the acts relating to the finances and currency, passed since the close of the war, can be justified by the principles of sound morality, or upon any other hypothesis than that the producing classes and tax-payers have no rights that bankers and money-lenders are bound to respect; and, I submit, is it not barefaced impudence for the advocates and supporters of these acts to claim to be the special guardians of the public faith and national honor, or even question the honor and honesty of any one not notoriously wanting in character for truth and integrity?

The Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

SPEECH OF HON. SMITH ELY, JR.,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 29, 1876,

On the operations of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. ELY. Mr. Speaker, although I do not believe it to be practicable at this session of Congress to perfect any legislation which will materially change the method of manufacturing the circulating notes and securities of the Government, yet an examination of the operations of this department recently made by a committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, impels me to bring this subject before the House, with a view to such future legislation as will increase the efficiency, economy, and safety of this branch of the public service.

A large manufacturing establishment is carried on by the Government in the city of Washington, employing from fifteen hundred to two thousand persons, with a monthly pay-roll running from $100,000 to $150,000, with apparatus and machinery upon which there has been expended between six and seven hundred thousand dollars. This factory was organized and has been maintained not under any law directly authorizing its establishment, but indirectly by clauses in various loan and appropriation acts. This factory is for the manufacture of fractional currency, United States notes, bonds, stamps, and other securities of the United States, and is the largest engraving and printing establishment in the world. This business is not carried on by the Government because it can do the work with greater security and economy than private parties, for the American Bank-Note Company supplied the Government long before this factory was started, and for nearly fifty years, printed the securities ready for issue, and furnishes them now to several governments in Europe and to almost all those in South America.

The operations of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing have been twice investigated and compared with the private companies by committees of Congress, and each committee has asserted the superiority of the private companies.

The Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment, of which Senator EDMUNDS, of Vermont, and Representative Halsey, of New Jersey, were the respective chairmen, was appointed in 1867, and reported March 3, 1869; they state that they "could not fail to be struck with the difference in the management and details, both personal and otherwise, between such operations carried on by paid officers of the Government and similar operations carried on by private persons or corporations." "Such a comparison is decidedly unfavorable to the Government engaging in any operations of this character where it can possibly be dispensed with;" "from political and other causes so large an element of incapacity and carelessness and unfaithfulness is introduced into the operations as in a considerable degree to derange and paralyze the efforts of those who are sincerely desirous of doing the best possible work for the Government."

This committee ascertained that more than $3,000,000 of securities other than fractional currency had been "lost, stolen, or unaccounted for." A schedule taken from this report of securities "lost, stolen or unaccounted for" between 1861 and 1867 is annexed hereto. The actual amount is probably much greater, for the committee say that "as to fractional currency in particular, if any fraud has occurred, it can never be ascertained from redemption unless the frauds have been enormous in amount;" and "that owing to the great number of these fractional notes which are lost and destroyed in the hands of the people it will never be possible to ascertain by redemption or otherwise whether there has been any wrong perpetrated on the Government in respect to them." (Report, page 86.) This same committee further report that the highest safety is to be attained by having the notes and securities printed at different establishments. It also found that there was no evidence that there had been one dollar lost through either of the bank-note companies.

The second investigation was conducted by the Committee on Banking and Currency in 1874 and 1875. Their report (No. 150, Forty-third Congress, second session) was made by William Walter Phelps, of New Jersey, February 17, 1875. They reported that, "although the recommendations of the Committee on Retrenchment were not embodied in a law, its moral effect was such that it was accepted as law by the Treasury Department. A complete and radical change was made, in accordance with the recommendation, in the preparation of the Government notes and other securities, namely: that the work of preparing the securities should not be done in any one place or establishment, but should be so distributed among at least three different establishments that no one or even two of them should have it in their power to furnish any note, bond, or coupon, and that the final process of signing and sealing (i. e., the authentication) should be done in the Treasury Department. That from 1869 to 1874 this work was mainly done by outside parties. In accordance with this report the Secretary contracted with two bank-note companies of New York, each executing one printing upon most of the notes and securities, the Bureau executing one upon the fractional currency and two upon the United States notes. That this plan was followed until 1874, when it was so far abandoned that all the work of preparing these securities was transferred to the Bureau, excepting one printing, which was done by a bank-note company in the city of Washington."

The committee say that "the system worked satisfactorily for five years; why should it be changed without some good reason? We ought not to change a system which started with such good authority, has worked so well, and strikes so favorably the common sense of the people." They reported that "the work of the Bureau is more expensive than that of the companies," and that therefore by taking the work from the companies and giving it to the Government the cost must have been largely increased. That the evidence proved that "in 1873 the Bureau employed between eleven hundred and twelve hundred persons, and these did less work than was done by the six hundred employés of a private company;" "that it seemed to be acknowledged by the Bureau that one-third of the cost in the Bureau is for what does not enter at all into the cost of preparation by the companies." The committee then give the items furnished by the Bureau which occasion this extra cost, and say:

> Why add 5 per cent. to the cost of securities to pay employés when they have nothing to do? Why add 25 per cent. to give employment for fewer hours and higher wages than the private company gives for the same work?

The committee do not answer these questions because they could not without admitting that these things were permitted only for political considerations. They say:

> If the Bureau was not already established and on our hands, it would be a question whether its operations might not properly be restricted to authenticating and finishing the Government issues.

There cannot be any doubt upon this point. No prudent man would run a factory at a large, constant annual loss simply because he had it on hand. No business should be managed by the Government on such a basis or controlled upon such principles. The committee in conclusion, therefore, recommend "that all the national-bank notes, United States notes, and other securities of the United States be executed with at least three plate-printings, besides the seal-printing; and that at least two of these printings be executed by responsible and experienced companies or establishments, no company or establishment executing more than one printing upon the same note or obligation."

The report was made at the close of the session, but as the committee was not called the bill they reported was not acted upon.

Secretary Boutwell followed the recommendations of the committee of 1869, but Secretary Bristow departed from this system, although it had been again recommended by the committee of 1875. He has taken the risk of departing from these instructions and of dispensing with one of these printings, and authorizing the only one performed outside of the Bureau to be executed in Washington by the Columbian Bank-Note Company. He has assumed the responsibility of giving up one of the guards which two committees of Congress had pronounced, necessary for obtaining the highest security. Anything less than the highest attainable security, when millions are at stake, is censurable, if not wrong.

The absolute necessity for the "highest safety" will appear from the following consideration: There is no intrinsic value in a bank-note or other security as there is in coin. If a given amount of bullion is deposited in the Mint, the coinage it should yield is easily and definitely ascertained, and any loss detected. If ten sheets of paper are received at the Printing Bureau, it cannot be ascertained by that fact whether they should represent when printed ten dollars or a hundred thousand dollars; and if this work is all done at one factory, or at two in the same place, there is much greater danger of fraud than if it is done at three establishments in three different places, each one a check upon the other.

The method recommended by these two committees affords an almost perfect security against fraud, overissue, or an increase in the face-value of the bill. The paper is made in a mill in Pennsylvania, under the inspection of a Government official, each sheet of a size adapted for a given denomination, counted, sent to the Bureau, then again counted and forwarded to one of the New York Bank-Note Companies, who are charged with the face-value of each sheet. They execute one printing and deliver each sheet to the Bureau, or pay for its face-value. The sheet is then sent to a second company, which executes another printing under the same responsibilities, and the paper is then delivered to the Bureau for the final printing and sealing. By this plan the paper-mill and each of the companies are a check upon each other and the Bureau, and the risk is reduced to the danger of theft in the Bureau. This danger would be further diminished by having the third printing performed outside the Bureau, confining its operations to sealing and finishing the note. There are now only two printings besides the seal, and one of these is done by a private company in Washington, the other by the Bureau. Greater facilities for fraudulent combinations among the employés are thus afforded than if this second printing was executed in another city.

The Secretary of the Treasury has not given any reason for dispensing with one of these safeguards and thereby increasing the risk of fraud. The liability to error, even with the best devised system of checks, was shown at the hearing before the Committee on Banking and Currency in 1875.

Secretary Bristow sent a communication to that committee concluding as follows:

> Since the adoption of a special paper and the present system of checks, a period of about six years, the Government has not lost the value of one cent or more, or a piece of paper the size of a ten-cent note.

That this statement was incorrect was proved by the production at the hearing of one hundred sheets of this special paper, of which the Bureau had no record, and by the accounts of paper delivered and received between the Bureau and the bank-note companies by which it was shown that the paper was frequently either "short" or "over." These facts established that the Secretary of the Treasury has not adopted the best or most economical method of printing the Government notes and securities, and that implicit reliance cannot be placed upon the system of checks devised by the Bureau.

APPROPRIATION OF APRIL, 1876.

It will be remembered that in April last a deficiency bill was introduced appropriating $200,000 for the purpose of carrying on the work in the Bureau because the entire appropriation for the year was exhausted. No reason has ever been given for this insufficiency of the appropriation; none can be given except the desire of the Bureau to increase its usefulness. The administration of Secretary Bristow resulted in an increase of Government patronage. This is evident from the replies of the Treasury Department to questions propounded by the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department of the present Congress. From these it appears that the largest number of employés in the year ending June 30, 1875, was thirteen hundred and forty-nine; that the least number for the next fiscal year was greater than the largest number employed the preceding year; that in January and February, 1876, the number was increased to sixteen hundred and sixty-nine, and the pay-rolls in the same ratio from $94,000 in July, 1875, to $147,000 in January, 1876; and by the middle of February the appropriation authorized to be expended for the full fiscal year ending July 1 having been exhausted, work in the Bureau was suspended. If Secretary Bristow had reduced the force of the Bureau as much as he increased it, the appropriation would have been ample to have carried on the work the whole year. There was no demand for the increased force. When the Bureau ceased to work it had on hand over 7,000,000 sheets partly printed, of which about 4,000,000 were fractional currency, besides having printed and issued during the seven months ending in July, 1876, a larger amount of fractional currency than in any preceding year. A prudent and faithful manager would have arranged his work in conformity with his appropriation, and been left with only a small amount of unfinished work on hand.

WATER-PROOFING PROCESS.

In the examination before the Committee on Banking and Currency it appeared by the evidence of Mr. McCartee, the chief of the Bureau, that "about $100,000 a year for the secret process" for water-proofing the paper (page 261) was paid to John M. Williams, (page 267;) that this process was entirely protected by a patent, (page 269,) and was intended to set the colors indelibly, to strengthen the paper, and afford a safeguard against counterfeiting. (Page 262.) These facts he said were proved by certain experiments made (page 267) by him and Mr. Jewell, then his book-keeper, now the chief of the Bureau, in 1871. This patented secret process was the Lowery patent, (Miscellaneous Document No. 163, page 15, answer,) and was a mixture of rosin and castile soap dissolved in alkali, with sulphate of zinc and salt. (Banking and Currency, page 413.) The House committee were doubtful of the value of this process, and recommended the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Bristow, to appoint a commission of experts to ascertain its practical use. Six months after this recommendation was made the Secretary of the Treasury requested Professor Henry, the president of the National Academy of Sciences, to appoint a committee for this purpose, and Professor Hilgard of the Coast Survey, Professor Chandler of Columbia College and president of the Board of Health of New York City, William Sellers, mechanical engineer, of Philadelphia, and Professor Morton of the Stevens Institute, Hoboken, were appointed by Professor Henry to report "on the usefulness of the process of increasing the durability of paper and security against counterfeiting; second, their judgment as to what would be fair compensation to the patentee, assuming the patent to be valid."

This committee, after a partial examination, in the autumn of 1875 submitted to the Secretary a memorandum of the principal points of a proposed report concluding that it was of great advantage and utility. (See Miscellaneous Document No. 163, part 2, page 14, in answer to questions of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, Forty-fourth Congress.) On the 31st of March, 1876, the Secretary replied, in answer to questions of this committee, that in consequence of this report he had seen no reason "to question the usefulness of the process, and therefore continued to use it until the Bureau was closed in February last," and continued that "as yet no formal or other report of the commission to whom the matter was referred has been received." It appears, however, from a note of Mr. Hilgard (No. 163, part 2, page 20) that the informal memorandum was given to the Secretary about October 1; that in November "he communicated to the chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and immediately afterward to Assistant Secretary Conant, Mr. Bristow being absent, the change of view arrived at. As the first statement had been informal, Mr. Conant being present, the second information seemed to me quite sufficient to bar any action in the premises." This change of view resulted from a more thorough examination, which proved that the "water-proofing process added nothing to the wear of the notes."

Professor Morton, by whom some of the experiments were made, states that the "average of twenty experiments shows a slight advantage for the notes not water-proofed."

It also appeared that—

> There is nothing in the Lowery patent but some special combination of well-known processes. * * * The patentee is entitled to credit for the suggestion, but has no proprietary right in it; * * * as satisfactory results could readily be obtained without infringing on the rights of the patentee.

The committee came to the conclusion that they could "not perceive that the durability of the notes in actual circulation is materially increased by the treatment in question," "nor that the advantages of the process in increasing the difficulty of counterfeiting are of any importance."

The report of this committee was submitted to Professor Henry, and by him forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury March 24, 1876, with a note, in which he stated that in his opinion the "value of the process is one of much difficulty, and that it can only be definitely settled by trial of the process in actual practice."

It appears from the evidence before the Committee on Banking and Currency that the Bureau commenced using this process about 1872, and continued it until the close of the Bureau in February last. The fractional currency printed in 1870 was 8,500,000 impressions, which the chief of the Bureau in his report for that year said was a much larger number than usual. In 1871, 9,500,000; in 1872, 12,630,000; in 1873, 11,500,000; in 1874, 12,000,000; in 1875, 12,988,000; and in the next seven months, 14,567,000. It thus appears that the results shown by the wear of the currency in use confirms the experiments of Professor Morton and the report of the committee.

It appears to be proved of this secret patented process—

First. That it was of no value.

Second. That no patent was required for its use.

Third. That for its use about $100,000 a year was paid to the former partner of the chief of the Bureau.

Fourth. That its use was followed by an increase in issue of currency of nearly 100 per cent., showing conclusively, by the crucial test recommended by Prof. Henry, that the paper was less durable.

It is worthy of notice that this process was continued for three months after Mr. Hilgard had notified the Department that the commission had concluded that it was of no utility or value.

REVENUE STAMPS.

In July, 1874, the Internal Revenue Bureau advertised for proposals for furnishing revenue-stamps, and in October contracts were awarded to the bank-note companies of New York at prices about 25 per cent. less than those paid to the Bureau. The deliveries under the new contracts were to commence on the 1st of January, 1875. Previous to these contracts the stamps were manufactured in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, excepting the tint-work. Although the Internal Revenue Bureau decided in July to have the stamps furnished by private parties and awarded the contracts in October, yet the Bureau continued the manufacture as though these contracts had not been made, and had accumulated a supply sufficient to overlap the stamps furnished under the contracts six months, and in April, 1875, delivered one-half of all they had manufactured for the year commencing July 1, 1874, at a cost of 25 per cent. higher than the contract price. Besides this, a new series of stamps had been adopted, and consequently the whole surplus must be again destroyed, involving a loss of over $150,000. This shows mismanagement in this Bureau.

It further appears from one of the schedules furnished to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department that the Bureau made a monthly charge for examining and counting the "tints" received from the bank-note companies. These charges, however, seemed to be based on no fixed rate. In September, 1874, the charge is $844.36 for 382,000 impressions, or $2 per thousand; in November the charge is $590.84 for 10,000 impressions, or $59 per thousand impressions.

The printing of "tints" by the bank-note companies ceased in December, 1874, but the charge for examination continued for the next six months at an average of $500 per month, but in April, 1875, there is an additional charge of $2,940.39 for examining 1,669,000 "tints," being probably the surplus on the old contract in the hands of the bank-note companies and given up at that time. The conclusions to be deduced from these facts are:

First. That an annual saving of at least $75,000 accrues to the Government by giving the printing of stamps to responsible private corporations;

Second. That under such contracts there is less loss by waste than when its work is executed by one Bureau for another over whose operations it exercises little control. The work is now performed under the direct supervision of a Government agent stationed at each establishment, and the companies are under bonds to pay to the Government the full value of every stamp unaccounted for. A distinguished member of this House recently urged as a reason for having this work all done at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, that it would give occupation to the many unemployed people of Washington. As a matter of philanthropy this argument is sound only because it requires a much larger number of persons in Washington than it does in New York to do the same amount of work. Apart from this I do not know what superior claim the unemployed of any one city have upon the consideration of Congress. And it is certainly unwise to attract to this city another thousand persons, mostly females, to be subjected to the questionable social influences which always surround a political capital.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to say that in my judgment the best system of checks devised by the Bureau is not infallible, and therefore fraud is possible. I concur with the reports of the Joint Special Committee on Retrenchment made in 1869, and of the Committee on Banking and Currency made in 1875, that the "highest safety in the printing of the bills and other securities can only be obtained when three printings besides the seal printing are executed on each issue, two at least being made by private responsible parties." I also think that all stamps should be executed by contract with outside parties.

Mr. Speaker, it was an old-fashioned democratic maxim that the powers and patronage of the central Government should be restricted to the narrowest practicable limits. I still adhere to that theory.

APPENDIX.

SCHEDULE OF SECURITIES UNACCOUNTED FOR.

According to the report of the Select Committee on Retrenchment the following securities were "lost, stolen, or unaccounted for" by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of loans made between 1861 and 1867, besides the fractional currency, of which it was impossible to ascertain the issue:

Page of report.	Number of obligations unaccounted for.	Denominations.	Amount.	Remarks.
5	1 U. S. bond	$1,000	$1,000	Unaccounted for.
8	2 notes	500	1,000	Do.

Civil Liberty and General Condition of the Country.

SPEECH OF HON. THOMAS L. JONES,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 29, 1876.

The House being in session for debate only—

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I feel that my constituents have a right to ask of me: What of the night? How stand our public affairs? What is the outlook from the nation's capital? Is office unbought and faithfully executed? Is the public service performed with fidelity? Is the Treasury guarded and the people's money honestly disbursed? Are integrity and virtue exemplified in the high places of our country? Is liberty secure? Is the Constitution maintained and is our Federal Union likely to endure? These questions, Mr. Speaker, are natural to every intelligent American citizen, especially to the man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow, loves liberty, lives honestly, pays his taxes, and now and then at least has a passing thought of how his money goes and what is the character of the Government under which he lives. Through you, sir, I propose to answer the sturdy yeomanry who have long honored me with a seat in the American Congress.

Political government, although essential to the civilization and happiness of man, is at best a partial evil most difficult of just and proper construction, and equally so of honest administration and maintenance. The history of the world proves this from the day when the babblers at Babel were dispersed down to the present time. Perfection seems not to be the mission of man to accomplish. He himself in his highest and noblest estate fails of the mark and all his works alike, although fair and comely for a season, fall in time below the perfect standard. The world deforms and contaminates, and in nothing does it appear more manifest than in civil and political government. Our primitive race, although led by the hand and taught by the word of God himself, failed to establish a social polity to be handed down to future generations as the guardian of the rights of man.

Experiments have been tried and tried again through the long list of ages, through the brilliant cycles of Greece and Rome and Spain and France and Germany and England, with their grand and mighty actors on the world's theater and their institutions of government, which seemed at the time all-powerful and everenduring. Despotism, aristocracy, oligarchy, republic, monarchy, absolute or limited empire, kingdom, constitutional government, have followed each other in continuous succession, and still experiment and change seem in the main to be the order of the day. The great men of earth, the wisest of rulers, and most philosophical of statesmen have ever been in search of true, fixed, and permanent civil liberty for mankind. Have they ever found it, or is the philosopher's stone yet undiscovered? Indeed, what is that civil liberty which all men wish to see established and truly to enjoy? Learned civilians differ in their definition of that golden rule. A distinguished writer has said: "A people who love liberty can do nothing better to promote the object of their love than deeply to study it; and in order to be able to do this, it is necessary to analyze it and to know the threads which compose the valued texture. I mean by civil liberty that liberty which plainly results from the application of the general idea of freedom to the civil state of man, that is, to his relations as a political being—a being obliged by his nature and destined by his Creator to live in society. Civil liberty is the result of man's twofold character as an individual and social being so soon as both are equally respected. The noblest human work, nobler even than literature and science, is broad civil liberty well secured and wisely handled. The highest ethical and social production of which man with his inseparable moral, jural, æsthetic, and religious attributes is capable, is the comprehensive and minutely organic self-government of a free people, and a people truly free at home and dealing in fairness and justice with other nations is the greatest, unfortunately also the rarest, subject offered in all the breadth and length of history.

All nations have had faint ideas of liberty. We read of ancient mediæval and modern liberty, of Greek, Roman, Anglican, Gallican, Pagan, Christian, English, and American liberty. The Greeks called it eleutheria, that polity in which all are in turn rulers and ruled. Cicero said, "Liberty is the power of living as thou willest," and Roman lawyers said "it is the power of doing that which is not forbidden by law," and they also said "Whatever may please the ruler has the force of law." Bodin, an eminent political writer, said that "true liberty consists in nothing else than the undisturbed enjoyment of one's goods and the absence of apprehension that wrong be done to the honor and the life of one's self, of one's wife and family. Montesquieu said philosophical liberty consists in the exercise of one's will or at least in the opinion according to which one exercises his will. Political liberty consists in the security, or at least in the opinion, which one has of one's security. A German author thinks liberty simple justice fully executed. "Liberty or justice, for where there is justice there is liberty." Other writers have said, "Civil liberty consists in the responsibility of the rulers to the ruled." The first French constitution says liberty consists in the right to do everything that does not injure others; the second says liberty is that faculty according to which it belongs to man to do that which does not interfere with the rights of others; it has for its basis nature, for its rule justice, for its protection the law; its moral limit is the maxim "Do not to another that which thou dost not wish to do to thyself." Liberty is equality. Dr. Paley wrote that "civil liberty is the not being restrained by any law but what conduces in a greater degree to the public welfare." Aristotle, Plato, Cicero in their works were mainly occupied with the discussion of the question, Who shall govern? The safety of the state was their principal problem; they said or cared but little for the safety of the individual.

But Algernon Sidney, when considering the rights of the rulers and the ruled, the wrongs of the oppressors and the good of the people, exclaimed, "The liberties of nations are from God and nature, not from kings." In the course of time, and the conflicts between the many and the few, the rulers and the ruled, by stout hearts and valiant hands the great muniments of human liberty had been established on English soil. Here begun its vigorous development and hence flowed the springs of its higher and purer life. Here were wrung from tyrants and raised up as beacon-lights for the generations to come, Magna Charta, the petition of right, and the bill of rights, the three statutes which Lord Chatham called the bible of the English constitution.

Mr. Speaker, let it never be forgotten by all of the English tongue and race that our brave and glorious ancestors laid the foundation, cemented with their blood, of the true temple of human liberty. Let it ever be remembered by our countrymen that "We belong to the Anglican race, which carries Anglican principles and liberty over the globe, because wherever it moves liberal institutions and a common law full of manly rights and instinct with the principle of expansive life accompany it; we belong to that race whose obvious task it is, among other proud and sacred tasks, to rear and spread civil liberty over vast regions in every part of the earth, on continent and isle. We belong to that tribe which alone has the word self-government. We belong to that nation whose great lot it is to be placed with the full inheritance of freedom on the freshest soil in the noblest site between Europe and Asia; a nation young, whose kindred countries, powerful in wealth, armies, and intellect, are old. Ours is a period when a peaceful migration of nations, similar in weight of numbers to the warlike migration of the early Middle Ages, pours its crowd into the lap of our more favored land, there to try and at times to test to the utmost our institutions; institutions which are our foundations and buttresses as the law which they embody and organize is our sole and sovereign master."

Our immediate fathers, the great architects of our political liberty, having enunciated and maintained by their valor the self-evident truths "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed;" and drawing their lessons from the best models ever adopted in all history, in their consummate wisdom they ordained and established the American Constitution. In this we have no concise or epigrammatic definition of liberty, but in its whole structure, although composite and complex, it defines, classifies, and regulates delegated governmental powers, retaining all others with ultimate sovereignty to the people, presenting in itself the most perfect and grandest system ever reared for the rights and liberties of civilized man. Its great object was and is to promote the welfare and happiness of the people and secure to them and their posterity the blessings of liberty. Unlike the political structures of old and of other lands, it considers and provides for the protection of the people, of the individual, as the chief object of the whole science of politics, and in this consist its strength, its virtue, its beauty, and its glory. Nearly one hundred years have rolled over its head; it has been assailed from without and from within; it has resisted the shock of foreign and intestine war; it has risen above every storm which threatened its ruin, and it still stands a wonder to the tyrant, an asylum for the oppressed, and a splendid monument to its immortal framers.

Mr. Speaker, nothing so disturbs a government or threatens its dissolution as civil war, and among no people in the tide of time has this great hazard, this sad calamity, imperiled the structure of their liberties as among our own. That we have survived it should be to us an ever-grateful and lasting congratulation. Our people, although homogeneous in the spirit of liberty and free government, were divided into States, with different institutions, institutions in one sense sectional, which engendered jealousies and animosities, barring that free and social intercourse which conduces to harmony and unity. Different constructions, too, were held of the character and powers of the General Government. Each school was tenacious of its doctrine; the defenders of each were ardent, brave, and able. Concession and compromise had worked in vain, and the conflict, long dreaded, came at last and drenched the land in blood. But blessed peace reigns again, and no patriot should stop to argue the why or the wherefore of that tremendous issue. Crimination and recrimination do not now become us. The past should be forgotton, except (as it never can be) in the proud and grateful remembrance of those noble spirits on both sides who fought or bled or died for the cause they believed to be just. Their names should be a glorious and a common inheritance. It may be hard to realize, sir, but it must be done or all our work is in vain. It becomes us now as a family reunited to turn our eyes and hands with vigilance and diligence to upholding in original intention and truth the Federal Constitution and Union, which, from the very dangers they have passed, should be all the more dear to our hearts.

War demoralizes and corrupts, and at its termination the party left in the ascendency of power have a most difficult task to perform. It is theirs to re-organize and re-establish, to bring order out of chaos, and to rehabilitate the citizen with his former protection, rights, and privileges. Great allowance should be made for the weakness and arrogance of mankind, especially when in the exercise of authority, the result of victorious arms. But our people have the right to know, and it is their duty to inquire, whether the party which emerged triumphant from the late conflict and still holds sway have done their duty to the States, the component parts of the Federal Union, and have maintained the sovereignty of the people. Have they re-established in "every State in this Union a republican form of government," the solemn guarantee of the Constitution they have sworn to support? Have they exercised powers "not delegated to the United States by the Constitution," and have they respected those reserved to the States respectively or to the people, and are they administering, in the language of Jefferson, "a wise and frugal government, which shall restrain men from injuring one another, shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned?" Have the Congress of the United States and the Executive carried out that solemn pledge made to the people at the beginning of the war for the Union: "Resolved, That in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feeling of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged upon our part in any spirit of oppression or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired, and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease?" This passed by a unanimous vote of the Congress, excepting two. Most benign purpose; most noble resolution; but how kept and carried out!

See, sir, how States have been disorganized, dismantled, and overthrown; how free government has been set aside and despotism installed; how intelligence and morality have been suppressed and ignorance and vice promoted and protected. See how base tools from abroad, strangers to the people, have been set up in their midst and supported by Federal bayonets to steal away their liberty and their property, to blur if possible their fair fame, to blot out their laws, to destroy their autonomy, and to desecrate the temples of their virtue. See how anarchy and tyranny have prevailed where order was promised, and republican government guaranteed and affirmed by oath to the people. It would be, Mr. Speaker, an unpleasant rehearsal and a sad commentary on American liberty to present a detailed history of the wrongs and crimes inflicted upon the southern people during the process of Federal reconstruction. That history is well known in part and has become but a "school-boy's tale." Its entirety would fill volumes and perhaps should never be read by the rising generation or if read at all but to arouse a sense of indignation against injustice and oppression and inspire greater devotion to the justice and freedom guaranteed by the American Constitution. It would seem to have been enough of punishment to those people for their crime, if crime they had committed, to deprive them of the right to govern themselves, to put governments over them not of their own making; in a word, to have made their own slaves their law-givers and masters; but to have organized a complex machinery by which the workers and manipulators of it were to steal away their substance has shocked mankind and destroyed every principle of human liberty. Foreign governors and their subordinates enthroned and supported by national authority, administered by the party still in power, have robbed and plundered the South, and their dark shadow still lingers over that noble but unfortunate people. The Bullocks and the Blodgetts, the Scotts and the Chamberlains, the Warmoths and the Kelloggs, with their hordes of placemen, will be remembered as the Goths and the Vandals of modern times.

Mr. Speaker, in considering the condition of a people or a commonwealth the first American idea educated under the civilization of constitutional liberty should be of their social and political condition; are they in the enjoyment of free government in the sense of the solution of the political problem which our fathers made? The money question or their pecuniary condition as essential to their happiness and well-being perhaps should be among the last to be ascertained. But as the American mind, especially in these degenerate days, is apt to inquire how the money is handled, how collected, and how disbursed, whence it cometh and whither it goeth, and the answer to these questions makes up the verdict of the American people as to the honesty and morality of their public servants or rulers, perhaps no better illustration can be given of the condition of the Southern States and of the character of their rulers than the table which I submit, showing the debts of those States at the end of the war when their governments were in their own hands and what they were at the end of reconstruction when their governments were in the hands of others.

Virginia.—Debts and liabilities at close of the war, $31,938,144.59. Debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $45,480,542.21.

North Carolina.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war—principal, $9,690,500; interest, $1,261,316; whole amount, $10,951,816. Debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $34,887,467.85.

South Carolina.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, $5,040,000. Debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $39,158,914.47.

Georgia.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, nominal. Debts and liabilities June, 1871, $50,637,500.

Florida.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, $221,000. Debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $15,763,447.54.

Tennessee.—Debts at the close of the war, $20,105,606.66. Debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $45,688,263,46.

Arkansas.—Debts and liabilities at close of the war, $4,036,952.87. Debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $19,761,265.62.

Louisiana.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, $10,099,074.34. Debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $50,540,306.91.

Texas.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, nominal. Debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $20,361,010.61.

Alabama.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, $5,939,658.87. Debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $38,382,967.34.

Thus it will be seen that the republican Legislatures, composed in the main of negroes and carpet-baggers, elected at the dictation of the party in Federal power, involved the ten States enumerated in the enormous aggregate debt of more than $284,000,000. Appeals can now be made to honest men and honest committees of the republican party itself, who have investigated the subject, that the grossest fraud and imposition have been practiced upon those States, and that a great part of the proceeds of this public robbery has passed into the hands and pockets of their public officials and plunderers. Never were a civilized people subjected to such indignities or so tortured in the very crucible of tyranny, and that, too, under a sworn free constitution of a Federal Union. Four millions of slaves were turned loose upon their masters; eight hundred thousand ignorant voters suddenly and forcibly infused into the body-politic. I say this not in blame of the negroes, for they in the main have done well and nobly, but to show what a transition in the social condition of a people and what an innovation upon their civil polity. Greece nor Rome nor the Middle Ages nor the modern states of Europe furnish any such example. But thank God, sir, the South is shaking off the dark pall which covered her, and is rising from the deep humiliation to which she has been subjected. Intellect and energy and courage will sooner or later hold pre-eminent place among men. The Cavalier and the Huguenot cannot long be kept down. The South is here again in the "father's house;" grand old Virginia and North Carolina and Tennessee and Georgia and Alabama and Mississippi and Louisiana and Texas are here with their able and noble representatives, sons to the "manner born," and true scions of the old régime. I joyfully welcome them home, and look to them to lift up their bruised and bleeding peoples from the dust and set them free; and I promise that the country may also look to them faithfully to stand by the pillars of the Federal compact and maintain the Union "in its whole constitutional vigor."

But, sir, let us withdraw our eyes from the South for a moment and see how the home Government has been administered by the party in power, how it has treated the States which adhered to the Union, and has misgoverned and oppressed the whole people. It would be an endless task to call attention in detail to their numerous financial schemes, their internal-revenue laws, their protective-tariff laws, their inquisitorial visitations into domestic and private concerns, to swindle the people out of their honest earnings, to eat out their substance, to put spies over their households, and place their labor unprotected and prostrate at the footstool of capital and power. Have they conducted public affairs with that economy which our fathers practiced and taught? Have they held public station as faithful public servants for the benefit of the people, or have their efforts been directed to self-aggrandizement and the building up of their own private fortunes? Have they regarded offices as public trusts or as instruments of personal perquisites? "Let facts be submitted to a candid world."

The financial system which has so afflicted the country was begun during the war. It was inaugurated under the plea of necessity, and if it had been honestly and wisely executed would not have worked hardships and oppressions from which the people could not in reasonable time have recovered; but it cannot be denied that the system was most loosely and criminally operated, operated for the benefit of the few against the interests and rights of the many. The bonds of the Government were from time to time recklessly issued and sold at mere nominal values, receiving its own money at immense discount and lavishing and squandering it in unauthorized expenditures. Millions upon millions found their way into the pockets of the contractors, speculators, and cormorants upon the treasure, the sweat and blood of the people. The war to preserve the Union cost twice or thrice as much as it should have cost, and, managed as it was, the result has been to mortgage the property, the industry, and labor of the people for years, perhaps for centuries to come to a favored few, an oligarchy or aristocracy called bondholders.

These individuals, in the first instance, rendered no service in preserving the Union. They took care of their bodies; they stood afar from the conflict, and their patriotism consisted in enriching themselves while others were bleeding and dying. They displayed their loyalty as usurers of the people's money and vampires of the people's blood; they purchased the bonds of the Government at 30, 40, and 50 per cent. discount, as gold fluctuated in the market or as the currrency rose or fell. The bondholders soon became bankers. Our law-makers, at the dictation of this great money-power, many of them having become bondholders themselves, established the odious national-bank system as a market for their bonds and as a basis on which to accumulate still higher rates of interest, thus piling usury upon usury. They crushed out private and State banks with sound and stable currencies, and established a great national monopoly, by which further to extort the hard earnings of labor and further to batten upon the substance of the people.

Twenty millions in gold of the people's money have gone every year since the war to pay the interest on these national-bank bonds used as instruments for oppression, while the holders paid no tax to the Government.

The public debt was thus increased without the consent or in apathy of the people to the enormous extent, in the estimates of some calculators, of $3,000,000,000, and by Government officials themselves to about two thousand eight hundred millions; and this much of the capital of the nation not subject to taxation. The bondholders owned nearly one-eighth of the whole property in the United States.

The people have so been enslaved, their patience so sorely tried, that they have in some sections even threatened open repudiation. They remembered the debt of England accumulating for centuries, and about one-eighth of her population born to poverty. They remembered that England repudiated in the reign of Henry VIII, and that Charles II closed the exchequer and wiped out the debt. They remembered that their own revolutionary fathers partially repudiated their debt, State and national; that Massachusetts redeemed her debt in 1749 at about eight cents on the dollar, and that Virginia, after the Revolution, retired hers at about one for a thousand. They remembered that Hampden braved the prison rather than pay an unjust tax of twenty shillings, and that our fathers made the Revolution rather than pay a tax not of their own making on a single article; that indeed their fathers had been compelled to repudiate a debt which helped to make them free, and they thought that they might repudiate one which made them slaves. But patience "has had her perfect work." The people are upright and honorable, and wish to redeem the Government from the shame wrought upon it by their rulers. They wish to pay the debt as it is seen by the world, whether honestly or dishonestly contracted. They wish their name to stand untarnished among the nations of the earth.

But, sir, I will pursue a little further the history of this legislation by the party in power to show how completely it has been in the interest of capital and for the oppression of labor. I point to the law of March, 1869, as the most striking and shocking illustration of this monstrous policy. I mean the law making the bonds of the Government payable in gold which on their face were payable in paper currency, the people's money, and so intended and expressly asserted by their makers when they were issued.

The republican party and the bondholders, when they triumphed in the election of General Grant in 1868, in furtherance of their policy manipulated their chief and induced him to proclaim in his inaugural address that "all the obligations of the Government not expressly otherwise stipulated should be paid in gold." The Congress thereupon and almost immediately after, acting as it were under the express command of the bondholders, and many of them bondholders themselves, passed the law to which I refer. This law, I say, sir, that made the bonds payable in gold which of right were payable in currency or greenbacks, at once increased the debt of the people at least $600,000,000, and without one penny's worth value received. It should be remembered in all time as the most onerous and infamous act in legislative history.

I promised the people whom I represent that one of the first bills or resolutions I should offer in Congress would be for the repeal of that act; and early in the session I had the honor to offer the following, which I read from the RECORD:

INTEREST-BEARING OBLIGATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Whereas the Congress of the United States passed an act approved March 18, 1869, entitled 'An act to strengthen the public credit,' and providing for the payment in coin or its equivalent of the interest-bearing obligations of the United States; and whereas said act was virtually a violation of various acts providing for the issue of certain bonds and obligations of the United States, especially those known as five-twenties, the principal of which at the time of their issue was understood to be payable in the lawful money of the United States, and so expressed in substance by both the political parties of the country in national convention, the republican convention of 1868 declaring that the national honor required the payment of the public indebtedness in the uttermost to the creditors at home and abroad not only according to the letter but the spirit of the laws under which it was contracted, and the democratic party of the same year declaring that where the obligations of the Government do not expressly state upon their face, or the law under which they were issued does not provide, that they shall be paid in coin, they ought in right and justice to be paid in the lawful money of the United States; and whereas said act, being no part of the original contract in letter or in spirit, was without consideration and therefore repealable at the will of any subsequent Congress; and whereas it was unjust, unequal, and oppressive legislation, greatly increasing the amount to be paid by the Government, and has inured, and as long as it exists will continue to inure, to the benefit of bondholders and capitalists and the positive detriment of the property and labor of the people: Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the said act, approved March 18, 1869, entitled 'An act to strengthen the public credit,' be, and is hereby, repealed."

In the resolution just read I endeavored to present an epitome of the history of that act and the argument for its repeal. It cannot be gainsaid that the republican party in this notorious instance broke its faith with the people and violated the pledges made by both parties in national convention. In presenting that resolution I but did my duty according to my convictions of right and honesty; but I suppose we shall not have the opportunity of voting upon it, as it will probably never be reported by the committee to which it was referred. Indeed, sir, I suppose it is now a settled question that notwithstanding all their complaints, protests, and just denunciations the democratic party itself, considering the difficulties and embarrassment to which the party in power has subjected the Government in the eyes of the world, have determined to pay its obligations, however unjustly made. As members of that great party which has so concluded in its wisdom, we must concur in its determination and if possible carry it out to the letter. We wish to see our country acquitted before all nations in fully vindicating its honor.

But, sir, let us examine a little further into this legislation of the republican party for the protection of capital against labor. The next act in this history was that of February, 1873, demonetizing silver, the legal-tender of the Constitution. This article had so increased in the world, and especially in our own country—rising from a production of from $40,000,000 to $45,000,000 in 1860; now to $70,000,000 per annum—that its value diminished very considerably below gold, and therefore the bondholders did not wish to receive it as a legal tender in payment of their principal or interest; so the Congress under their influence destroyed the value of the silver dollar. Everything must be subjected to them and all former values regulated and fitted to the exact payment in gold of their debt. Importunate as Shylock, they would claim even the "pound of flesh." Look at the contest now going on, sir, in order to restore the silver dollar to its original and constitutional function as a legal tender in payment of all debts. How violently it is opposed by this same bond-holding power and its allies and abettors on this floor. The democratic party must restore the silver dollar to its original value, and make it a legal tender in payment of all debts, as was intended by the framers of the Constitution.

But again and lastly, sir, as the culmination of this ruinous policy and as the cap-sheaf of this stack of infamies, the country was saddled with the law of 14th January, 1875, for the resumption of specie payments; all for the benefit of the bondholder and the capitalist, and directly against the labor and industry of the people. This law drew fifty millions from circulation and caused the suspension of two hundred banks. Sir, behold the result; look abroad over our vast domain, from center to circumference, in the great cities, in the towns, in the country, everywhere. See how internal commerce and trade are prostrated, how the various manufactories and all industries are paralyzed, how values are diminished, how energy and enterprise are numbed and stagnant, how labor, able-bodied and feeble, is idle, and begging in the streets, in the highways and by-ways of the land. How our foreign commerce has dwindled comparatively to nothing; ship-building in our country almost abandoned in consequence of material being so heavily taxed, when fifteen years ago we had about one-third the tonnage of the world in our hands, and now we are almost driven from the seas. Some of us on this floor have been struggling from the beginning of the Congress to repeal this impracticable and ruinous law, and we hope soon to accomplish the righteous purpose. This picture, is but, sir, the direct and legitimate consequence of the legislation of the party in power. Can the people much longer bear its policy or its presence at the head of public affairs?

The tariff system, too, under the protective theory re-organized and promoted by the republican party since 1860, has been a most fruitful source of revenue to the capitalist and manufacturer, and most oppressive to the agriculturist, the consumer, and the people in general. The tariff so wisely re-adjusted by the democracy in Congress in 1845 for revenue and against protection was annulled and the protective theory revived and gradually increased up to 1866, though since somewhat modified. Our law-makers, rejecting the learning and ability of Adam Smith, Sir Robert Peel, and Richard Cobden, with the experience of England and other nations before them, have adhered to the protective system and set at naught the principles of free trade, which alone can make a nation prosperous and great. They have given protection to the manufacturers of iron, of steel, of copper, of salt, of wool and cotton, and the various articles made of each, but no protection to the agriculturists, who make up more than half the increased riches of the country, in the sweat of whose faces is the last analysis of our wealth.

In England less than one hundred articles are taxed for revenue, indeed but ten or twelve chiefly; and here we have had five thousand and more, all foreign articles, from 50 to 250 per cent.; tea, coffee, sugar, tobacco, to an enormous extent. Every man who uses a spade, hoe, plow, or wagon, who drives a nail in his roof or puts a shoe on his horse, pays about double what he ought to pay for the article. Every ounce of salt put in his food, every pound of iron or steel or foot of plank that is used in any form, every hat or shoe or garment that is worn, costs nearly double what it ought; and so with almost every article of prime necessity to man from the cradle to the coffin.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is proper to inquire how much of these immense taxes and revenues has been collected by this party within the last ten years and how it has been expended. If we turn to the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, we find that since 1866 there have been collected from the people $4,682,000,000, nearly $2,000,000,000 more than the entire debt at its highest figure after the war, namely, $2,773,236,173. And yet, sir, the debt to-day, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the month of July of the present year, stands, principal and interest, at $2,203,550,345.31. May not the people aptly ask of their rulers, "What have you done with the $4,682,000,000 which according to your own figures we have paid you in the last ten years, while you make a showing of but $450,000,000 paid on our debt?" Ah, sir, they never will and never can answer this question; it is reserved for their opponents, the democracy, who have been keeping watch over them, to investigate and find out the truth and make it known to the people.

To estimate properly the enormity of our present debt and the present expenditures of the Government, it is only necessary to compare them with what they were but sixteen years ago. Then the Federal debt was less than sixty-five millions; since the war it has been as high as $2,773,236,173, and now stands at $2,203,550,345.31; the interest alone amounting to more than twice as much as the debt before the war. Then the annual expenditures were about $63,000,000, since the war as high as $350,000,000; an increase of 450 per cent., when the population had increased but 22 per cent.; and now the expenditures are near $200,000,000.

It has been estimated that at least fifty millions have been annually spent more than was necessary to maintain the Government. We collected in customs for the year ending June 30, 1869, one hundred and eighty millions in gold; but to collect that we had to tax the people over $400,000,000, $220,000,000 of which went into the coffers of the manufacturers of the North.

Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, a republican Senator, stated that the defalcations of public officers under Grant's administration, the first term, amounted to more than $3,000,000. A commission was appointed to look into the civil service, and they reported that in one year, when the collections amounted to $383,000,000, $95,000,000 were lost by the corrupt men in office; and yet no reform has been enacted in the civil service. The revenue from tariff alone for the several years from 1868 to 1876 has been as follows:

1869	180,048,427
1870	194,538,374
1871	206,270,408
1872	216,370,287
1873	188,089,523
1874	163,103,834
1875	157,167,722
1876	147,850,000

Making a grand total of $1,617,903,175. Where has the money gone? Echo answers, where!

Let us compare somewhat in detail the expenditures of the Government under democratic rule for a period of years and then under republican rule for a like period. From 1852 to 1860 the annual expenses were:

1852	$37,988,095 78
1853	42,321,830 15
1854	50,734,863 42
1855	54,838,585 39
1856	65,476,397 99
1857	64,730,763 12
1858	71,110,668 87
1859	65,133,727 36
1860	58,955,952 39
Total amount net ordinary expenses for nine years, from 1852 to 1860	511,280,804 47

Let us see what they have been from 1867 to 1875. It would not be fair to include the interest on the public debt and the annual pensions, and so I omit the appropriations for these purposes in the following table:

1867	$182,011,182 16
1868	206,132,701 53
1869	161,989,783 17
1870	136,081,304 98
1871	123,139,932 70
1872	124,668,453 43
1873	154,129,210 04
1874	149,580,570 34
1875	142,073,632 05
Total amount net ordinary expenses for nine years, from 1867 to 1875	1,376,806,720 20

In other words, the expenses of the Government under republican rule are nearly three times what they were under democratic. One cause of the increase is that the republicans have quartered an army of office-holders on the people. This army is growing every year. Instead of cutting it down the republicans are enlisting new recruits all the time. One would naturally suppose that less employés would be required in 1875 that in 1865, when there was a large amount of business of one kind or another growing out of the war; but the reverse of the picture is the fact. The army of office-holders was larger in 1869 than in 1865, and in 1875 that in 1869. Here are the figures:

Departments.	1865.	1869.	1875.
State (clerks only)	37	47	63
Treasury (all)	6,243	8,082	11,316
Interior (all)	1,507	2,171	3,750
War (all)	3,303	1,336	4,720
Navy (all)	141	173	10,000
Justice (all)	221	239	728
Post-Office (all)	41,144	41,346	65,726
Legislative	183	295	314

If the republican candidate in the present contest should be elected these figures will probably be greatly increased. No wonder the people are suffering, that business of all kinds is dull, and that the poor man is becoming every day poorer. In the language of Mr. Tilden, our leader, "We cannot afford the magnificent taxation of the republican party."

I might, Mr. Speaker, go on with these details ad infinitum; indeed, the vast amount of money collected from the people in the last ten years, to include no more, in various and numberless ways is incomprehensible and past finding out. Many suppose it to exceed six thousand millions. But take their own showing of the amount and I repeat the question, what have they done with the nearly $5,000,000,000 which the people have paid them? We can only find the answer in the developments which have been forced out of them, in the acts of their prominent leaders, in their rings in the custom-houses, in the post-offices, in the Indian Department, the Internal Revenue Department, in their real-estate pools, District rings, crooked-whisky rings, postal straw-bid rings, their Navy contract rings and Cattelling commissions, San Domingo jobs, Secor claims and Chorpenning claims, and the thousand corrupt combinations, big and little, which have covered them with disgrace and shocked the honesty and decency of mankind. They will tell us that they have been protecting the colored man, restoring the Government, re-establishing prosperity, developing the country, protecting the frontier, rebuilding the Navy, reforming the civil list, erecting a sound financial system, and endeavoring to give a stable currency to the people, and this is the way the money has gone. But they have done none of these things. Facts speak for themselves, and in them alone can we find answer.

Thanks, Mr. Speaker, and all honor to the people of this country who two years ago, driven to indignation at these enormities practiced upon them by the ruling dynasty, rose up in their might and under the democratic banner elected a majority of true representative men to this House. The people are now looking to them for an account of their stewardship, and they will not be disappointed, sir, in the record which they have made. The people have seen their acts and they speak for themselves. They will see how our vigilant and faithful committees have labored day and night to investigate the acts and doings of public officials and the disclosures they have made; they will see how at every step the opposing party in this House and in the Senate have resisted their investigations and endeavored to conceal the frauds and flagitious transactions of their leaders and officials for these long years they have been in power. How, when we have attempted to discharge supernumerary employés of the Government, they have persisted in retaining them. How, when we have attempted to cut down salaries and diminish public expenditures, they have striven to keep them the same, and even to enlarge them. How we have exposed the wrongs and villainies of their appointees and have stripped their high officials of the cloaks which covered them, and have shown them in all their naked deformity; how, I say, our opponents in both Houses of Congress have done their utmost to defend and uphold them. While making this strenuous opposition they are still professing honesty, economy, and reform. "They make broad their phylacteries and enlarge the borders of their garments, and love the uppermost rooms at feasts and the chief seats in the synagogues;" "They bind heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers." Blind guides, scribes, Pharisees, hypocrites, the people will see their professions but judge them by their acts.

See, sir, in every appropriation bill reported to this House by the democratic committees in their effort to restore and practice economy and retrenchment, how the opposition have resisted and delayed, in the foreign diplomatic and consular bill, the Military Academy bill, the legislative, executive and judicial bill, the post-office bill, the Navy bill, the Army bill, the Indian bill, and the sundry civil bill. In all these appropriations and almost in every instance where the democratic party in this House have lopped off and cut down, the republican party have held fast to the former offices and the old figures. For the benefit of those who may read my remarks on this occasion and especially for my constituents I submit a statement showing the work of the democratic party in the House in reducing expenditures below those of last year and below the estimates of the Departments for the year to come.

* This statement has been carefully corrected and compared.

It is thus seen that we propose a reduction of $64,362,116.90 below the estimate of the Department for the year ending June 30, 1877, and of $38,516,312.09 below appropriations of the last year ending June 30, 1876.

We yet hope, sir, although the prospect is not bright, that we shall before the adjournment of Congress be able to reach these reductions in the public expenditures and to that extent relieve the people of the burden of taxation. If we succeed we shall be entitled to general commendation and praise, and the grateful verdict "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

Mr. Speaker, as a most striking illustration of the demoralization of the times and especially of the dominant party, we have seen how the power of impeachment, among the highest of the House of Representatives, presented in the name of the whole people, has been scorned and trifled with and how in the trial of a high Goverment official, a Cabinet officer, the Senate of the United States sitting as the highest court known to the Constitution have screened and defended and acquitted him, failing to claim proper jurisdiction, perverting the law and the evidence, and ignoring their sworn responsibility to the Constitution of their country. Under technical evasions and pretenses they have pronounced a man not guilty whom in their hearts they believed to be guilty. It is thus seen how dealers in base bribes and pilferers in office are screened and protected and sent forth unwhipped of justice. But, sir, the example is not without its terror to evil-doers and its virtue to the people. Other high officials have been investigated and exposed in this House and alike have been defended and upheld by their friends. We may pile their wrongs and offenses mountain-high and expose them in the glare of the noonday's sun, still they will be proclaimed innocent and "pure even as the angels in heaven." Nothing is more difficult, sir, than to convict the leaders and the exponents of a party still in the ascendency of power when the party itself is alike participant in crime and corrupt and rotten to the core.

I might extend the account of these investigations for hours, but I refrain from giving further examples; the task is not a pleasant one. The people of this great country are a reading people; they see daily accounts of the proceedings of their servants in Congress; they will examine the record and make up their judgment. The question with them is: "Shall we longer keep the republican party in power; can they ever cure their own disease or with their own hands cut the cancer out? In all history has ever a party purified itself?"

The spirit of our Government is change of administration. Parties seem to be necessary at times to root out dishonesty and corruption and restore integrity and purity in public affairs. It is evident that the party in power is not adequate to the great task. The duty to them is impracticable and impossible. The remedy is change of administration. It belongs to the democratic party; it is their high mission to the age and to posterity. In this House they have begun their career and they have put on their armor for the great and final struggle for the administration of the Goverument. They have chosen wise, experienced, and patriotic leaders. They have placed before the country a platform of principles presenting undeniable truths and promising the reforms so much needed throughout governmental affairs. The people must take their Government into their own hands or their liberties are gone. They must drive from office the miscreants who have so misused and abused their powers and privileges, and put in their stead honest and faithful men who will regard office as a high and sacred trust from the people and not pervert it to their own base and selfish uses. Economy, retrenchment, and reform are inscribed on our banners and they must be the watchwords of our hosts, and with the noble Hampden's motto, "No step backward," we shall go on conquering and to conquer. Let us proclaim amnesty, equality, liberty for all, special and exclusive privileges for none. And here, sir, I may be allowed to say that from the beginning of my participation in public life since the war I have ever been in favor of striking the shackles of political disability from every American citizen. From time to time I have offered bills and resolutions to effect the gracious and noble purpose, and on the eve of one of our national holidays in this centennial year I endeavored to place before the House the resolution I take the liberty of reading:

"Resolved, That in view of the great increase, general health, and prosperity of our people in this blessed year, the one-hundredth anniversary of American Independence, and in commemoration of the birthday of our beloved Washington, 'first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen,' we do hereby remove all disability imposed under section 3, article 14, of the Constitution of the United States, and do declare complete amnesty and oblivion for all past political offenses, invoking the blessings of Almighty God upon our counsels and our country; that our Government may rest 'upon the best and surest foundations; that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety may be established among us for all generations.'"

I still commend this sentiment to the Congress. We must come to that, sir, if we would secure the respect of our fellows, the commendation of posterity, or the amnesty of Heaven for ourselves.

But, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the picture I have drawn of the management of our public affairs by the republican party; notwtihstanding the gloom which at times seems to envelop us, we have yet much to encourage and cheer us on. The same skies are above us which looked down upon our fathers, and the same earth is beneath us which bore the print of their footsteps. We must return to their good old ways. We have a great country and a great people to develop and provide for. We have the grandest territory that ever filled the scope of man's vision or was made a place for his habitation, a land of lakes and rivers and mountains and valleys to inspire his genius, stimulate his industry, excite his enterprise, gratify his tastes, enlarge his comfort, and promote his happiness; a land girdled and protected by the great oceans of the world, and inviting the commerce of all nations. We have great examples of courage and wisdom and patriotism before us, with monuments to their fame all around us.

There stands the column to Washington which, honor be it said at last to the American Congress, is soon to be lifted to its destined height and shed a glory over the land. Here are the great public edifices erected by the labor of American freemen. Here are the walks and seats made sacred by the great statesmen who have preceded us, and here is our great Capitol, the country's pride, peerless in its beauty and grandeur, the temple of American law, enthroning on its pinnacle the image of American liberty; and lastly, we still have the Constitution, the foundation of our political fabric and the last and best embodiment of civil liberty. Let us hold fast to it as the anchor of man's hope, rejoicing in our inheritance, let us preserve it unbroken and hand it down unimpaired to those who are to come after us. In the inspired verse of our early patriot-poet, let us waft the glad invocation to the teeming millions as they come and ever chanting as they march:

> Columbia, Columbia, to glory arise,
> The queen of the world, and child of the skies!
> Thy genius commands thee; with rapture behold,
> While ages on ages thy splendors unfold,
> Thy reign is the last and the noblest of time,
> Most fruitful thy soil, most inviting thy clime,
> Let the crimes of the East ne'er encrimson thy name,
> Be freedom, and science, and virtue thy fame.

Repeal of the Resumption-Day Clause.

SPEECH OF HON. GEORGE W. CATE,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 5, 1876,

On the bill (H. R. No. 3074) to repeal in part the resumption act of 1875.

Mr. CATE. Mr. Speaker, I regard this as one of the most important measures that have engaged the attention of this House at this session; a measure demanded by the best interests of the whole country, by the voice, as I believe, of a very large majority of the people, and reiterated in the platform of the late Saint Louis convention, one of the largest and most intelligent bodies of men ever assembled on this continent. Whether the people are right or whether they are wrong, there can be no mistake that an opinion is wide-spread, almost universal, that the so-called resumption act ought to be repealed, and the country has been amazed and disappointed that action has been so long delayed on this important subject, for let it be understood that the resumption law is but one of a series of measures involved in the great contest now going forward in this country between the creditor class on the one side and the debtor class—the people—on the other.

Behind these measures stand the "money kings" of the world, located in England and Germany, who hold to a large extent the credits of the world and who have entered upon a scheme to appreciate the value of those credits in every possible way. Europe is already in their power and the subjugation of this country is now in order. Shall it be accomplished? is the question of the hour. Thus far in the contest they have been successful, and whether final victory is to crown their efforts the next few months will determine. First the bondholders demanded that their bonds payable in currency should be paid in coin; next they demanded that silver should not be a legal tender for sums above $5, leaving their debt payable in one money only, gold, and of which we had the least. Next in order they demanded the resumption of specie payment on the 1st day of January, 1879, which means, of course, the destruction of the greenback and national-bank circulation and the payment of every debt, public and private, above $5 in gold, which will largely add to the demand for gold, enhance its value, of course, and increase the value of the Government bonds in their hands. Every demand of the bondholder has been responded to with interest, until the country finds itself prostrate at the feet of the money power, every industry crippled and all its avenues to prosperity closed.

In this struggle, which is not only of interest to us but attracts the attention of other nations, the republican party, through the Congress of the United States, has thrown all its power and influence in favor of the bondholders and the creditor class, and against the interest of our own people. It has, by every means in its power in this House, opposed the repeal or modification of these unjust measures, and I want the country to understand that the party in power is justly chargeable with championing the cause of the money-lenders of Europe instead of the industrial interests of this country.

Now, sir, there is no design to ignore the precious metals in the monetary system of this country, and while the people with whom I act believe that an early and forced resumption of specie payment will produce wide-spread disaster to every interest but one, they will disapprove of any scheme that does not contemplate at as early day as practicable the appreciation of the paper money of this country to a full par value with gold; and further they demand the restoration of American silver to its rightful place in our currency, and by every possible means hasten the day when gold as well as silver shall once more constitute a part of the currency in daily use. But as the use of gold as a currency in this country is impossible at the present or in the near future, let us by wise and judicious legislation make the greenback as good as gold; not destroy it, for the people will not surrender it, for they regard it the best currency in convenience and safety this country ever had.

Never, sir, have we had a currency to which the people are so much attached or with which they will part with more regret, and they will look with disfavor upon any attempt to displace it with the issues of any banking corporation whatever, for they know that it possesses a stability and uniformity in value that gold has not possessed. Why, at the very threshold of the great rebellion, almost before an ounce of powder had been burned, every dollar of gold and silver had fled the country, compelling a suspension of all the banks; their bills went to protest; redemption of their issues could not be made because the necessary gold and silver could not be had; it had fallen into the hands of the Shylocks of Europe, and was hoarded by everybody in this country who could thus protect themselves against the trash which bank paper always becomes when there is any disturbance of its basis, the "money of the world." The Government was powerless to equip, pay, and feed its soldiers and furnish the appliances of war with "honest money;" though a high rate of interest was offered for it, it could not be obtained.

The Government in extreme necessity, in the hour of its greatest peril, was compelled to resort to some resources of its own to carry on the war or succumb to the power that would destroy it. It was compelled to cast away the boasted "money of the world," which, unstable and unreliable even in time of peace, had broken in pieces like a vessel of crumbling pottery at the first speck of war. It did issue a paper currency based upon the faith and credit of the nation with which to pay its armies and for the use of its people in their private transactions; and I take pride in saying that from that day onward, through all the terrible war, involving an average daily expenditure of millions of dollars, not a single dollar of any other kind of money was used by the Government in the discharge of its obligations or by the people in the transaction of their business; neither did the Government, in the sale of its bonds, receive a dollar in any other money; and, if "honest money" was used at all, it was in buying greenbacks at a discount with which to buy the Government bonds. The greenback did all this and more. It constituted a currency equal in all respects to the wants of trade, cheap and convenient, and free from the fluctuations and instability to which the money of the world has always been subject. It has built our railways and canals, furnished homes to thousands and thousands now reaping its benefits beneath their own vine and fig-tree, who, under the domination of hard money, must have remained hewers of wood and drawers of water. It has enabled us to record an advance in all the elements of empire that finds no parallel elsewhere. It has built up and endowed our churches and institutions of learning, and enabled us to provide for the weak and unfortunate in institutions suitable for their comfort and improvement; and yet gentlemen declare it a "stupendous fraud." It has furnished to labor employment and given to it the necessaries, if not the luxuries, of life; and has the laboring-man complained that he has been poorly paid or that his remuneration has been less than he would have received under a hard-money régime?

And yet gentlemen shout, with their faces turned up to the gallery, "Labor has been cheated." Ah, labor has been cheated; cheated out of employment, but not by the greenback currency, but by the ruinous policy of contraction that is being forced upon the country. Labor is knocking at your doors, and the voice in your galleries the other day is but the echo of thousands in every nook and corner of the land demanding opportunity to work. But, says the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE,] "a paper currency, which is only a promise to pay, which is never fulfilled, must bring disaster wherever employed." It is not easy to conceive of a proposition more radically at war with established facts than this proposition is. It is not the design of Government in furnishing a currency to furnish one that may safely be "salted" down for future generations, or buried in pots, as Captain Kidd was said to have buried his ill-gotten gains, but to furnish a medium of exchange to circulate in the live present as the life-blood of teeming, smoking enterprise; and if it be one that pays our taxes, discharges all our money obligations, builds our houses, pays for our lands, and beautifies and improves them, and is in all respects a full legal tender, is not the promise of payment fulfilled? What more is desired in any currency? If the greenback has furnished us the sinews of war, set the wheels of industry in motion, built our railways, improved our rivers, cleared the forests, and opened our mines, is that disaster?

When I look back along the fleeing past and observe on every side the wrecks of broken fortunes, blasted hopes, and shriveled enterprises, and rotting machinery which mark the domination of hard money, and on the other hand the activity and life infused into these shrunken forms and lifeless images the moment such a currency as the greenback made a full legal tender is infused into the arteries and veins of business, I am induced to remind the gentleman that such declamation is the veriest bosh in the world. Is industry cheated if through the instrumentality of the greenback it is transformed into lands and buildings, food and clothing, and anything that is useful or desirable to possess? "Was industry cheated and defrauded" when, in 1861-'62, all the gold and silver had fled the country before the march of "grim-visaged war," and in consequence the currency was broken down, individual credit gone, ships idle, warehouses empty, and seamen and sailors out of employment? The greenback was introduced; and everything is changed; activity and enterprise are visible where before were decay and death.

Now I do not take the trouble to prepare tables illustrating the progress of the country in material wealth during the greenback period, but it has been very great, greater than in any like number of years. The increase of private wealth is enormous; in the purchase and improvement of lands for agricultural purposes it is immense—substantial, enduring wealth that neither moth or rest doth corrupt, all of which has been done with the aid of the greenback; a progress in substantial, enduring wealth which no change in the finances can take away, although by that means it may be greatly depreciated; but it cannot be annihilated, but must remain a real accession forever. And is it any the less solid, substantial wealth because its accumulation was through the instrumentality of the greenback? It is not true that paper money has ever been a fruitful source of evil except when issued on a specie basis, and then only when the superstructure, gold and silver, gave way; and the assumption of the gentleman that the present condition of the country as shown in its curtailed industry and enforced idleness is wholly due to our paper currency rests in mere assertion—not an argument used, not a fact adduced in its support; but I charge that the reason is to be found nowhere else but in the legislation before alluded to, looking to final resumption, which policy has been continued to the present time with all the mischievous consequences attending a contraction of the currency at a time when there is no more in circulation than the needs of business require. To show that this has been done I put the President on the witness-stand. In his message of December 1, 1873, he says:

> In view of the great actual contraction that has taken place in the currency and the comparative contraction continuously going on, due to the increase of population, increase of manufactories and all the industries, I do not believe there is too much of it now for the dullest period of the year. During the last three years the currency has been contracted directly by the withdrawal of 3 per cent. certificates, compound-interest notes, and 7.30 bonds outstanding on the 4th of March, 1869, all of which took the place of legal-tenders in the bank reserves to the extent of $63,000,000. During the same period there has been a much larger comparative contraction of the currency. The population of the country has largely increased. More than twenty-five thousand miles of railroads have been built, requiring the active use of capital to operate them. Millions of acres of new land have been brought under cultivation, requiring capital to move the products. Manufactures have multiplied beyond all precedent in the same period of time, requiring capital weekly for the payment of wages and the purchase of material; and probably the largest of all comparative contraction arises from the organizing of free labor in the South.

Gentlemen in this Hall or out of it may deny that there has been any contraction of the currency; but with all due deference to them I prefer to take the statement of the President, whose views are just and statesman-like. The actual contraction bears no proportion to the compartive contraction growing out of the increase of population and consequent increased demand for money for new avenues for its employment. Forty millions of people require more money than thirty millions, everything else being equal, and if the larger had no more than would suffice for the lesser, there would be a scarcity and consequently oppression in business. But the greatest possible contraction lies in the fact that the South, so long prostrate and unproductive from the desolating effects of the war, is just springing into life and energy, like a strong man girded for the contest, and to develop all her industries requires a vast outlay of money, more from the fact that it starts as it were from the bottom rung in the ladder of poverty. At the close of the war we had plenty of currency for the business of the country; it was confined in its circulation to the Northern States or largely so; but after the peace, which, God willing, may never be broken, the South gradually opened to the circulation of our money, and it flowed in rapidly because that section was absolutely without money, its own confederate currency having gone down with the flag at Appomattox. It at once demanded an immense amount of money and the drainage to go there began to be noticed at the North; for an amount of currency not too great for half the people was now forced to do the business of the whole, creating a large comparative contraction.

Two features of the times present themselves: contraction of the currency and hard times going hand in hand; and as contraction, actual and comparative, increased year by year, depression in all branches of business became more and more intense, until it culminated in a general crash in 1873. There was no lack of funds in business circles or lack of confidence in the future up to the period when to contract the currency became the settled policy of the Government; but as soon as contraction was understood to be the policy of the Government all was changed, and there was at once a lack of confidence in the future, an uncertainty as to the extent to which that policy would be pushed by the Government, for however politicians may differ as to the effects of a radical contraction of the currency, capital, ever wary and watchful of its interests, is never deceived and was not now deceived, but at once set its house in order to gather the rich harvest about ripening for its sickle under the scorching sun of contraction. And yet we are told that the only remedy lies in still further contraction to the extent of wiping out the entire greenback circulation.

But let us try this question also by the lights of experience. We have noticed the wonderful prosperity of England under inconvertible paper from the bank suspension in 1797 to 1819, at which latter date the bill for a gradnal return to specie payment became a law, full resumption to be obtained in four years. As soon as this law was passed the bank at once prepared for the resumption of specie payment by the most stringent efforts to contract its paper circulation so as to render redemption in coin possible, and did succeed in reducing the circulation in the four years of preparation for final resumption $100,000,000. The effect of such a contraction is best told by a historian of that period.

Alison says:

> The effects of this extraordinary piece of legislation were soon apparent. The industry of the nation was speedily congealed, as a flowing stream is by the severity of an arctic winter. The alarm became universal, as wide-spread as confidence and activity had been. The country bankers who had advanced largely on the stocks of goods imported refused to continue their support to their customers, and they in consequence were forced to bring their stock into the market. Prices in consequence rapidly fell; that of cotton in particular sank in the space of three months to half its former level. The country bankers' circulation was contracted by no less than five millions sterling. The entire circulation of England fell from £48,278,000 in 1818 to £40,928,000 in 1820; and in the succeeding year it sunk as low as £34,145,000. Nothing in this disastrous contraction of the currency at a period when its expansion was so loudly called for sustained the national industry or averted a general bankruptcy but the fortunate circumstance that the obligation on the bank to pay specie was by the act of 1819 only to commence on the 1st of February, 1821, and this enabled that establishment in the preceding autumn, when the crash began, not only not to contract its issues, but even in a slight degree to increase them.
> The effects of this sudden and prodigious contraction of the currency were soon apparent, and they rendered the next three years a period of ceaseless distress and suffering in the British islands. The accommodation granted by bankers diminished so much, in consequence of the obligation laid upon them of paying in specie when specie was not to be got, that the paper under discount at the Bank of England, which in 1810 had been £23,000,000, and in 1815 not less than £20,660,000, sunk in 1820 to £4,672,000, and in 1821 to £2,676,000. The effect upon prices was not less immediate or appalling. They sunk in general, within six months, to half their former amount, and remained at that low level for the next three years. Imports sunk from nearly £36,000,000, in 1818, to $29,769,000 in 1821; exports, from £45,000,000 in the former year to £35,000,000 in the latter. Distress was universal in the latter months of the year 1819, and that distrust and discouragement were felt in all branches of industry, which are at once the forerunner and the cause of disaster.

Speaking of the condition of the country and the causes alluded to, Mr. Baring, a member of the celebrated firm of Baring Brothers, and one of the most honorable and sagacious bankers of his time, said:

> Looking at the facts growing out of the contraction of the currency, it is material to show what is the state of the country in this the sixth year of the peace. Petitions are coming in from all quarters remonstrating against the state of suffering in which so many classes are involved and none more than the agricultural class. When such is the state of the country in the sixth year of peace and when all the idle stories about overproduction and underconsumption and such like trash have been swept away, it is natural to inquire into the state of a country placed in a situation without a parallel in any other nation or time No country ever before presented the continuance of so extraordinary a spectacle as that of living under a progressive increase in the value of money and decrease in the value of the productions of the people. It appears clear that from the operations of the currency we have loaded ourselves not only with an immense public debt, but also with an increased debt between individual and individual, the weight of which continues to press upon the country and to the continuance of which pressure no end can be seen.

In Doubleday's History of England we find the following statement of the effect of the resumption measures:

> As the memorable 1st of May, 1823, drew near, the country bankers as well as the Bank of England naturally prepared themselves by a gradual narrowing of their circulation for the dreaded hour of gold and silver payments "on demand," and the withdrawal of the small notes. We have already seen the fall in prices produced by this universal narrowing of the paper circulation. The effects of the distress produced all over the country, the consequence of this fall, we have yet to see.
> The distress, ruin, and bankruptcy which now took place were universal, affecting both the great interests of land and trade; but among the landlords whose estates were burdened by mortgages, jointures, settlements, legacies, &c., the effects were most marked and out of the ordinary course. In hundreds of cases, from the tremendous reduction in the price of land which now took place, the estates barely sold for as much as would pay off the mortgages, and hence the owners were stripped of all and made beggars.

In 1822 a resolution was offered in the British Parliament calling for a committee to consider the effect of the resumption act upon the industrial interests of the kingdom, and in the debate growing out of it Mr. Atwood said:

> In the year 1818 the average price of wheat was eighty-four shillings per quarter; and if the present price be taken at forty-seven shillings, that is a reduction on wheat of thirty-seven shillings, which is equal to a fall £45 in every £100, or 45 per cent.
> The price of iron in the year 1818 appears to have been £13; that price is now £8 8 per ton, and is equal to a reduction of about 40 per cent.
> The price of cotton in 1818 was one shilling, and it was sunk to sixpence per pound, which is a fall of 50 per cent. on cotton.

Wool in the year 1818 sold at 2*s.* 1*d.*, which now sells for 1*s.* 1*d.*, and there is, therefore, in wool a fall of nearly 50 per cent.

The fall that has taken place, therefore, since 1818 in iron, in cotton, and in wool is as great as the fall in wheat. These are the great staples of commerce, and the average of the fall upon all three is 45 per cent., being exactly the reduction in grain.

This is recommended to the consideration of those who tell us of overproduction and an excessive cultivation of corn-land; but I refer also to a table compiled by Mr. Tooke, which contains a list of the principal articles of commerce and manufactures, thirty in number, which exhibits the same fall of 45 per cent. in all the articles except indigo, the price of which has been sustained, as I am informed, by circumstances of an exceptional kind.

The fall, therefore, is not peculiar to the products of agriculture, but is universal and has embraced every article of industry and every article of commerce. This fall of prices must have been produced by one of two causes: either the quantity of all commodities has increased or the quantity of all money has diminished. One of these must of necessity have occurred, for the proportion is altered. Are we to believe that great changes have suddenly taken place in the productive powers of nature or the resources of art, so as to account for this sudden and universal fall in prices?

Is it likely that production in all the branches of industry, agricultural and manufacturing, would go on for three years constantly increasing in the presence of a constantly diminishing price? Evidently, it is not so.

In the midst of this fall of prices what operation in business could proceed without loss or ruin? There has been no form in which the capital of the merchant, none in which the capital of the manufacturer, could be invested without the half of it being sacrificed during this calamitous period. We have been thrown back upon a condition of society in which all industry and enterprise have been rendered pernicious or ruinous, and where no property is safe unless hoarded in the shape of money or lent to others on a double security.

Finally, the distress was so great that the Parliament felt obliged in the very year fixed for final resumption to extend the circulation of paper money, when immediate relief followed. Two years later the bank attempted to reduce its circulation of paper, in other words, contract the currency, which, says Alison, was followed by a destruction of values and a loss of production as great as if a fire had swept over half the island. Seventy banks failed and two-thirds of the merchants suspended, followed by the usual distress and suffering to the workingman and his family.

Relief was found in a further issue of paper money, always an unfailing remedy, showing beyond cavil or question that the trouble was caused by reducing the volume of the currency below the necessities of trade and below the amount the people had been accustomed to and to which the business of the country had adjusted itself.

Now, is this history of British finances, so closely in its general features and detail resembling our own, of no force and value to us? How can we ignore the great truths contained in these illustrations? How is their bearing upon the questions we are considering for ourselves to be denied? Either history lies and the observations of the most careful observers teach falsehoods, or the experience of England ought to control our action. Yet gentlemen in the discussion of this question will persist in ignoring these truths of history, and without attempting to refute them, boldly assert, in the face of this experience, that the only salvation for our country lies in the same course so often followed by the British financiers, and which invariably brought ruin to their country, while they have only words of condemnation of the policy we advocate, and which the English were always compelled to resort to to relieve the country from the evils of contraction.

Point me to a single instance anywhere when a contraction of the currency has not produced just the condition of things existing in England and in this country while contraction was going on. It cannot be done. Such results follow as unerringly as the needle points to the pole. Yet the country is full of "Daniels," who set at defiance all experience, all history, and ascribe results, which the best writers on social science and the most noted financiers in Europe or this country charge to an undue contraction of the currency, to the material of which that currency is composed. Let us examine for a moment the condition of our own country at the time this policy was entered upon. From 1865 to 1869 the circulation had been large, lending a wonderful impetus to all branches of business. Thousands of miles of railways had been built; millions of acres of new land had been brought under cultivation; manufactures had multiplied beyond precedent, requiring vast sums of money and giving useful investment to immense sums that but for the new avenues to its use would not have been called for. The plenitude of money was of itself an inducement to an embarkation in enterprises that otherwise would not have attracted attention; and therefore it is no doubt true that very large sums of money were invested in enterprises of recent origin and rapid growth, like the growth of vegetation under the stimulating influences of fertile soil and genial sun. But at the very noontide of this prosperity, when the demands of trade and commerce were established and fashioned to the conveniences and privileges awarded by an abundant currency, comes contraction, to culminate in resumption in 1879, and we find the same condition of things that we experienced in 1861 and was experienced in England in her efforts at resumption from 1819 to 1825, and which must grow in intensity as the day of complete resumption approaches, because resumption means nothing more nor less than the destruction of the whole greenback currency, and resulting, as I shall attempt to show, in a much larger contraction than even that. The consequences will be fearful, but are easily foretold.

Is it a wonder that capital hoards itself in anticipation of the rich harvest in store for it? Is it a wonder that the busy hum of industry is hushed, that enterprise stands aghast and looks on amazed at the follies of men, and that labor in alarm cries out for work? For all know what resumption means, that it means scarce money, its purchasing power increased, while the relative value of everything else is diminished in the same ratio. It means that capital is to be benefited to the injury of everything else. The industries of this country that have grown up with and are giving profitable employment to a currency amounting to at least $750,000,000 can never survive a contraction of one-half of that sum; they cannot; that is history; and the same results must follow in the attempt of our Government to resume by contraction that have always attended a forced resumption policy everywhere. There are few failures in business, while the volume of currency is ample; all that can find profitable investment; but the moment the ordinary, full, ample volume is diminished through a settled policy of contraction, that moment there is trouble.

In 1865 we had, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, $1,100,000,000 in circulation; now we have, say, $750,000,000. During 1863, 1864, and 1865, the years of the greatest expansion, the liabilities of the commercial failures amounted to $34,000,000. At this point, 1865, McCulloch inaugurated his policy of reducing the currency, followed in 1866 with commercial failures amounting to forty-eight millions, or fourteen millions more than in the previous three years before contraction was resorted to. In the next three years, down to and including 1869, under the same policy, the liabilities of commercial failures reached the astounding sum of $208,000,000; and McCulloch, in his report for 1868, boasts that since August, 1865, he had reduced the circulation $372,000,00. For the years 1870, 1871, and 1872 the aggregate of liabilities of commercial failures amounted to two hundred and eighty-six millions, and for the single year of 1873 to two hundred and twenty-eight millions.

After such a record as this, can there be a glimmering, lingering doubt in the mind of any man of the ruinous effects of such a policy? But gentlemen tell us there is no contraction of the currency; how then is resumption to take place? It cannot be brought about at the early day fixed for it with the present volume of currency. Nobody pretends it can be accomplished except in the destruction of the entire volume of legal-tenders. In some way and by some means it is proposed to retire the whole greenback currency, take them out of circulation, the effect of which would be the same as it would be if the legal-tenders were declared invalid by reason of a want of power in the Government to issue them.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in passing on the question of the right of the Government to issue and make the greenbacks a legal tender, and the effect upon the country of a decision in such an event declaring such currency invalid, said:

> All debtors are loaded with an obligation it was never contemplated they should assume. A large percentage is added to every debt, and such must be the demand for gold to satisfy contracts that ruinous sacrifices, general distress, and bankruptcy may be expected. These consequences are too obvious to admit of question.

These consequences follow by reason of the contraction of the currency to the extent of the greenback circulation, and it can make no possible difference whether that is brought about by declaring the greenbacks illegal, and therefore not money, or by funding them into gold bonds. The effect is the same. The volume of the currency is diminished in the same amount by either process, and the effect upon the country must be the same. Will some learned advocate of resumption explain the important phenomena, too common to be considered remarkable, that this unhappy condition of the country never exists under currency sufficient in volume to satisfy the demands of trade, but does appear the moment the volume in actual use is diminished to an appreciable extent, and disappears as soon as the amount abstracted is supplied. Says an eminent writer:

> Whenever the money volume of the currency of a country is not large enough to furnish a circulation sufficient for the business of the people all trade will suffer, manufactures will be stopped, enterprises checked, debtors become insolvent, and as a consequence the laboring-classes will be thrown out of employment and reduced to the verge of starvation. An increase of the money to the proportion required by the growing developments of trade will on the other hand necessitate an increase of all kinds of enterprises and effect a corresponding prosperity among all classes of people.

Another objector says the trouble lies in our having too much money, and an able Senator declared in debate that the volume of currency should be reduced to I think $500,000,000, and that when so reduced it would possess more purchasing power than the $750,000,000 we now have in circulation. Ah, to him who hath the money this argument will commend itself, but what shall be said of him who hath it not, and who, to obtain it, must sacrifice his property just to the extent the purchasing power of money is enhanced. It is to the debtor class that this question presents itself in all its terrible and hideous deformity. There will be no suffering on the part of "Money Bags;" he will get his pound of flesh though it reduce the poor debtor to starvation.

Now are we to profit nothing by the experience of the past in our own and other countries, furnishing the most indubitable evidence of the consequences attending a serious contraction of the currency below the amount to which the country has become accustomed, and with all that experience pointing in one unbroken line to and exposing the terrible evils always attending such a policy? Are we to pay no heed to all this experience and example of a hundred years of advancing science and civilization, furnishing not one fact to contradict these conclusions, notwithstanding our situation since this resumption policy was entered upon is and has been precisely the situation of every people where such a policy has been resorted to, and blindly and arbitrarily ascribe our troubles to circumstances which, although present whenever such a currency has been used, have never been understood as productive of mischief? Such a currency received the approbation of Franklin and Jefferson and Calhoun, was resorted to with advantage in the financial troubles of England already alluded to, carried our country through the most stupendous as well as the most lamentable war ever enacted on this continent, and enabled France to withstand the terrible results of the German war. Of this currency President Grant in the message already mentioned says:

My own judgment is, * * * that a specie basis cannot be reached and maintained until our exports, exclusive of gold, pay for our imports, interest due abroad, and other specie obligations, or so nearly as to leave an appreciable accumulation of the precious metals in the country from the products of our mines.

To increase our exports, sufficient currency is required to keep all the industries of the country employed. Without this, national as well as individual bankruptcy must ensue. * * * Elasticity to our circulating medium, therefore, and just enough of it to transact the legitimate business of the country, and to keep all industries employed, is what is most to be desired. * * * The experience of the present panic has proven that the currency of the country, based as it is upon the credit of the country, is the best that has ever been devised. Usually in times of such trials, currency has become worthless, or so much depreciated in value as to inflate the values of all the necessaries of life as compared with the currency. Every one holding it has been anxious to dispose of it on any terms. Now we witness the reverse. Holders of currency hoard it as they did gold in former experiences of a like nature.

It is patent to the most casual observer that much more currency, or money, is required to transact the legitimate trade of the country during the fall and winter months, when the vast crops are being removed, than during the balance of the year. With our present system, the amount in the country remains the same throughout the entire year, resulting in an accumulation of all the surplus capital of the country in a few centers, when not employed in moving crops, tempted there by the offer of interest on call loans. Interest being paid, this surplus capital must earn the interest paid with a profit. Being subject to "call," it cannot be loaned, only in part at best, to the merchant or manufacturer for a fixed term. Hence, no matter how much currency there might be in the country, it would be absorbed, prices keeping pace with the volume, and panics, stringency, and disasters would ever be recurring with the autumn. Elasticity in our monetary system, therefore, is the object to be attained first, and next to that, as far as possible, a prevention of the use of other people's money in stocks and other species of speculation. * * * In view of the great actual contraction that has taken place in the currency, and the comparative contraction continuously going on, due to the increase of population, increase of manufactories, and all the industries, I do not believe there is too much of it now for the dullest period of the year. * * * During the last three years the currency has been contracted, directly, by the withdrawal of 3 per cent. certificates, compound-interest notes, and 7-30 bonds outstanding on the 4th of March, 1869, all of which took the place of legal-tenders in the bank reserves to the extent of $63,000,000.

During the same period there has been a much larger contraction of the currency. The population of the country has largely increased. More than twenty-five thousand miles of railroad have been built, requiring the active use of capital to operate them. Millions of acres of land have been opened to cultivation, requiring capital to move the products. Manufactories have multiplied beyond all precedent in the same period of time, requiring capital weekly for the payment of wages and for the purchase of material; and probably the largest of all comparative contraction arises from the organizing of free labor in the South. Now every laborer there receives his wages, and for the want of savings-banks the greater part of such wages is carried in the pocket or hoarded until required for use.

These suggestions are thrown out for your consideration, without any recommendation that they shall be adopted literally, but hoping that the best method may be arrived at to secure such an elasticity of the currency as will keep employed all the industries of the country.

I commend this opinion of the republican President to the gentleman from Massachusetts who pronounces this currency a "cheat and a fraud." "There is plenty of money lying idle in New York," we are repeatedly told. Money is plenty in Wall street, I suppose; but to whom? To the man who is able to pay the interest demanded and who is able to put up United States gold bonds as security to repay the sum loaned on demand. To such borrowers money is plenty; but to the class that desire to put the money into enterprises in which the country is interested there is not a cent: first, because such borrowers cannot use the money to advantage and have it subject to be demanded at any time and, secondly, because that class of borrowers cannot put up gold bonds as security; so the fact is that the speculators in stocks, the "bulls and bears" of the money market, to the injury of all legitimate business, can get all the money they want to use, because their business is such that they are enabled to repay at any time; but not a dollar for him whose capital is his reputation and who would use the money to the general benefit of the whole country.

What has stopped the wheels and looms of our factories and turned their operatives into vagrants and tramps, and dried up so many enterprises hitherto prosecuted with so much vigor and benefit to all classes of society? I answer, money cannot be obtained for the purposes, and therefore they languish. And why is all this "plenty money" idle in Wall street in the face of such wide-spread necessity for its use? We know that ordinarily money goes into the business of the country, becomes, so to speak, the "handmaid of commerce," is loaned to those who desire to invest it in the usual business enterprises of the country, and any legitimate business fairly conducted has not in times past been allowed to languish for the want of money; but now all this is changed, and why? Because the language of this contraction policy with a view to resumption is that under its operation manufactures will be obliged to stop work for want of a market for their goods. Lumbermen will be obliged to hold their stocks or sell on credit; large numbers of people will be out of employment; nobody is able to buy, because not able to pay; and therefore consumption will be greatly lessened and money scarce. If money is loaned to persons in branches of business thus affected it will not be repaid. Money on hand is growing in value every day, and when complete resumption takes place it will be worth as much as gold, and so the man of money keeps his funds so invested that he can get it the moment it is wanted to be "resumed" into gold.

These are the circumstances under which money is plenty and the reasons why it remains in Wall street, not because it is not wanted in the ordinary channels of business, but because those who would use cannot get it, or if they could get it dare not because of the uncertainties of the future.

The scheme for converting the greenbacks into 3.65 bonds and their reconversion into greenbacks again is naively pronounced by my friend from Massachusetts either a "gigantic folly or a stupendous fraud." Persons holding views on this question antagonistic to mine might perhaps reasonably claim my views to be a folly, but how this scheme can be characterized as a fraud is not quite clear, inasmuch as the interchange is altogether optional with the holder, the greenbacks are worth as much as bonds, and no more, and the only advantage in the conversion is that the bond draws interest. I fail to perceive the fraud, and I think it will trouble the gentleman to demonstrate just where the fraud comes in.

But let us examine it for a moment. There is a necessity for some provision of this kind to avoid a difficulty present in every hard-money system, namely, a want of elasticity; and I contend that no financial system is perfect which allows the Government or the banks arbitrarily to fix the amount of the currency which may be allowed to circulate and above or below which it cannot go, because, as everybody knows, more money is needed at one time than another, depending on circumstances such as the moving of the crops, the necessity of supplying some product that has failed, to build up a burned city, &c., and the President hit the nail squarely on the head in his message of December 1, 1873, when he said:

To increase our exports, sufficient currency is required to keep all the industries of the country employed. Without this, national as well as individual bankruptcy must ensue. Elasticity to our circulating medium, therefore, and just enough currency to transact the legitimate business of the country and to keep all the industries employed, is what is most needed. It is patent to the most casual observer that much more currency or money is required to transact the legitimate trade of the country during the fall and winter months, when the vast crops are being moved, than during the balance of the year.

With our present system the amount in the country remains the same throughout the year, resulting in an accumulation of all the surplus capital of the country in a few centers, when not employed in moving crops tempted there by the offer of interest on call loans. Being subject to call, it cannot be loaned. Hence no matter how much currency there might be in the country it would be absorbed—prices keeping pace with the volume, and panics, stringency, and disaster would ever be recurring with the autumn.

Why with the autumn? Because more money is then needed to move the crops, and being already absorbed in call loans in the large cities it cannot be had, and therefore money is scarce.

Elasticity in our monetary system therefore is the object to be first attained.

But just how this fault in any hard-money system is to be remedied is the very question to be solved. And bearing on this question I read from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year 1873:

It must be obvious to all who have an interest in, or who have watched the course of, the business or financial relations of the country, that there are times when the real wants of the country demand and there should be an increase of currency, and that there are other times when the safety of all legitimate business requires that it should be largely reduced. What is really needed is a currency so flexible as to at all times accommodate itself to the real business wants of the whole country.

The greatest objection to an exclusively metallic currency is its want of elasticity. That there are regular recurring times when the wants of legitimate trade require an expansion of the circulating medium to an amount much greater than is necessary at other times, is a fact that is patent to all observing business men. When the times arrive for the purchase of the crops and other products of the country, and for their transportation from the interior to the seaboard and a market, immense amounts of currency are imperatively demanded for the purpose, which, when the mission is accomplished, are not wanted for any legitimate purposes of trade and commerce; and, therefore, seek, for the time being, other channels of profitable use. Unfortunately, not being needed as a medium for the interchange of values, this redundancy of the currency is driven into channels of wild speculation in fancy stocks and visionary enterprises. Here it is stranded; and when again needed for the real wants of the people, for the proper transaction of the business of the country, it cannot be had, and the staple commodities and crops that then seek a market are hindered and kept back, through which all classes of people are injured and damaged. * * * For these notorious evils a remedy should be found and interposed. In looking over the whole ground, no scheme has presented itself that would be so likely to accomplish the end in view as the authorization by Congress of the issue of a certain amount of legal-tender notes, that could at all times be converted into a currency interest-bearing stock of the United States, and for which the holder of such stock so authorized could at pleasure, at any time, receive legal-tender notes, with the accrued interest, from the day of issue of such stock to the day of its redemption. It is believed that a rate of interest no higher than 3.65 per cent. will be high enough to absorb the desired amount of the circulation when not needed for commercial purposes, and low enough to force the return of the bonds in exchange for legal-tender notes at the times when the business wants of the country shall require more currency. * * * This practice on the part of national banks of paying interest on deposits, and especially that of one bank allowing interest on the deposits of another, whether they be permitted to hold the proposed bonds as a part of their reserves or not, should be forbidden by law, under the severe penalty of the forfeiture of their charters.

Indorsing these views is the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the same year.

In addition to the opinions of these gentlemen, whose official position compels them to reflect on the best means of supplying and regulating the currency so as to adapt it to the necessities of the people, I might call attention to the sayings and writings of the best minds in the country versed in the principles of social science, who have considered this question from no political or partisan stand-point, but from a desire to ascertain the truth. Yet in the face of the teachings of these eminent men the politician of a day will coolly pop up in his place and, without attempting an argument, pronounce this interconvertible-bond scheme a "gigantic folly or a stupendous fraud;" which means, I suppose, that those who advocate it are either "knaves or fools."

"What becomes of the dollar in all this jugglery between greenbacks and bonds?" says Mr. SEELYE. "The greenback," say the Supreme Court, "is equivalent in value to the representative of value under the coinage acts." In other words, that the greenback, like a gold or silver coin dollar and to the same extent, is a legal representative of value, is merged in the bond when not wanted for use, drawing as high a rate of interest as labor pays.

What are the objections to this scheme? I have heard none going to its usefulness; nothing save an attempt to prejudice the public mind against it by pronouncing it a fraud, but we are not told in what the fraud consists. Its benefits are that it furnishes a safe temporary investment for funds not wanted for immediate use, to remain in the nature of "call loans," the bonds being convertible into legal-tenders whenever wanted for business purposes—far safer than to deposit in any bank where there is no security save the personal integrity of the banker, which sad experience has often demonstrated is not the best security a person can have for the repayment of money; but here the person would have the bond of the Government, and for the payment of which, principal and interest, its faith is pledged. This scheme once in operation, and we should hear less of losses by the failure of so-called "savings-banks," but which are in fact but chartered institutions to swindle the people. Such a scheme would meet with favor from the people. The gentleman seems startled because this inconvertible-bond scheme has become so prominent in to-day's politics; but does he not know that the principle was recognized and approved and put in practice by one of the ablest financiers that ever stood at the head of the Treasury?

In his report of December 10, 1863, Secretary Chase, in speaking of the benefits that would ensue from a distribution of the public debt among the people, said:

> To this end he desired authority to receive temporary loans in the form of deposits re-imbursable after a few days' notice.

Acting upon this suggestion Congress authorized the receipt of $25,000,000 at a rate of interest not exceeding 5 per cent., then raised the limit to $50,000,000, and soon increased it to $100,000,000, and in a short time the highest limit was reached, and when the first account was made up it had reached $107,000,000. This shows that the people would gladly accept the United States Treasury as their savings-bank and lend it their surplus earnings. Said the Secretary in continuation:

> These convictions remain unchanged and seem now to be shared by the people. For the first time in our history has a real approach to a uniform currency been made, and the benefits of it felt by all. * * * The limits of deposits for temporary loans are fixed at $100,000,000. The Secretary perceives no solid reason for retaining the restriction on loans in this form to that amount. It may be usefully removed. As the advantages of these deposits become better and more generally understood, the loan in this form will doubtless in the absence of restrictions be largely increased. Such an arrangement, the Secretary thinks, would operate beneficially by increasing the amount of currency when unusual stringency shall require increase, and reducing its amount when returning ease shall allow reductions.

When money is plenty beyond the immediate wants of those who have it, such surplus can be deposited with the Government at interest, in that way reducing the volume of the currency to the actual demands of business. When the busy season comes, such as moving the crops, and a stringency is felt, the deposits can be withdrawn and the greenbacks go into circulation, relieving the stringency in the money market. This is the substance of the recommendation of Mr. Secretary Chase and contains the whole gist of the present inconvertible plan; and it is respectfully submitted that it contains neither fraud nor folly. Fortunate would it have been for this country had Mr. Chase continued in charge of its finances.

But, as before remarked, it is not intended to force this scheme on the people if they prefer to still leave their surplus money with savings-banks and other institutions which speculate and trade in their depositors' funds at the sole risk of the depositor, there is no law to prevent it; it is simply offered to the people as furnishing a convenient and safe deposit, and which it is believed will prove as beneficial to the Government as it will be safe to them.

But one class of people have any reason to object to this scheme. Those who might have occasion to take advantage of the privileges it affords should not object to it, because, if not approving it, they are not obliged to patronize it. But I can well see why the savings and other deposit banks should be opposed to it, because it offers superior advantages to depositors, and therefore will be likely to take from these banks a large portion of the funds they now receive on deposit, and which they loan out and use in speculations, and from which they hope to derive a profit; if they lose their deposits of course "Othello's occupation is gone." Hence the tremendous efforts of the money power to prevent the adoption of this plan; but this, or some other plan presenting its prominent features, will in the near future be resorted to, for the idea is rapidly impressing itself upon the minds of the people that some principle shall be introduced into our finances that shall in volume enable it to adjust itself to the ever-varying demands of trade, and if any better than the plan under discussion shall be proposed, for one I shall gladly accept it. Millions are lost to the depositors and thousands of people reduced to absolute beggary every year by the failure of savings and other banks of deposit. People deposit their all in these institutions without the security of a cent for a return of the money, while in this plan there is no possible chance of loss because the United States is the banker.

The republican party having decided to force resumption on the 1st of January, 1879, the only remaining question for consideration is how to do it. The gentleman in his speech says three plans are proposed: The first is to hoard gold until a sufficient amount is secured to make resumption possible. A second plan is to destroy the greenbacks as fast as they are paid into the Treasury in payment of public dues; and he ventures the opinion that this plan if rigidly adhered to will produce specie payment. It becomes inevitable, he asserts, as soon as the paper is driven out. It stands in the way of specie payment. No doubt the gentleman is correct. The effect of the retirement of the greenbacks will be to bring us to a currency of gold and silver, but it will be attained only through more suffering than was ever witnessed in this country before, because the effect will be to drive the national-bank notes which are redeemable in greenbacks out of circulation, for the profit on their circulation will not allow the banks to keep gold idle in their vaults with which to redeem their bills as long as gold remains at its present price. It seems to me the sheerest folly to suppose the banks can float their bills. So long as gold is worth the present premium there is not a single bank in the United States that could stand the pressure thirty-six hours. They would be at the mercy of the gold brokers to the extent of their circulation. We have a legal-tender circulation of nearly $400,000,000. How much gold must be collected to commence with, to make complete resumption sure, gentlemen do not tell, or where it is to come from. Of course if it is got at all it must be in Europe, and will it be possible to obtain it there?

In speaking upon the probability of obtaining any considerable quantity of gold for the purposes of resumption, Mr. BOUTWELL, former Secretary of the Treasury, says:

> It is useless to attempt to bring any considerable amount of gold from Europe to this country, because the money interest will combine to prevent it, and will be able to prevent it. When the sum of but $21,000,000 belonging to this country had accumulated in the Bank of England, we were notified that the attempt to take it away would be resisted with all the power of the bank, and the same course was pursued with regard to the Geneva award and the United States was obliged to accept in lieu of the gold which belonged to them securities. There are in the nine principal banks of Europe only $600,000,000 in specie, and it is held as a reserve with reference to their local business and with reference to the great transactions that take place between the countries on the continent of Europe and Great Britain. In the face of these facts is it to be assumed for a moment that we can go into the markets of the world and purchase gold with which we can redeem four, three, two, or even one hundred million outstanding legal-tender notes?

Such evidence is sufficient to show the utter hopelessness of such a scheme if no other reason existed. But aside from that consideration, and conceding that a sufficient amount of gold can be procured, the hoarding of so large an amount of gold would create still further derangement of the currency by increasing the scarcity and consequent value of gold, and would derange the finances of every country in which gold is an important element, producing contraction with all its attendant injuries, and in addition the loss to the world of the use of such a vast sum of money. But even that is not all. The gold if obtained at all must be by the sale of gold bonds to be issued by the United States—interest, of course, payable in gold. To this the people will not consent. Far better destroy the greenbacks than to still further increase the public debt to the extent of hundreds of millions to get rid of a currency with which the people are well satisfied.

Gentlemen say in answer to the admitted facts that the retirement of the legal-tenders will cause the withdrawing of the bank-paper. "Gold and silver will flow in as the paper is driven out;" but where will it flow from? We have seen that nine of the principal banks of Europe control at least one-half of all the gold in the world. Will they surrender it to us? And how shall we be able to retain it, even only sufficient to constitute the basis of a currency, in the face of our large foreign debt payable in gold, which is annually drawing from us far more than our mines produce? How, if the Bank of England was able to prevent the removal of the comparatively insignificant sum of $21,000,000, our own property, shall we be able to obtain and bring away from Europe the hundreds of millions necessary for our use. No, sir; it cannot be done. We cannot maintain a currency of gold as long as we are sending so much money abroad to pay the balance of trade against us. When, through wise legislation, our industries shall be developed and our productive capabilities brought into full requisition, enabling us to spare enough for exportation, to turn the scales and leave a balance in our favor, then, and not until then, may we expect to see gold coming to our shores and taking up its abode with us. But industries are not encouraged or production increased by diminishing the volume of the currency. It is plenty of money that imparts life and viger to industry and thereby increases production.

A third plan of resumption, and which the gentleman thinks should be at once put in operation, proposes the issue of interest-bearing gold bonds to be disposed of for greenbacks, that is, sell the bonds, taking pay in greenbacks, until the whole volume shall be absorbed. This scheme presents the question whether it is advisable to increase the interest-bearing public debt to discharge another debt (greenbacks) which bears no interest. Gentlemen should hesitate before attempting to push this scheme, for the people are opposed to any further increase of the public debt for such a purpose. I hope no such measure will succeed, for I believe it will be attended with results highly detrimental to the interests of this country. I believe I have already shown that the destruction of the greenback will necessitate the retirement of the national-bank notes in case resumption becomes a fact on the 1st of January, 1879.

The passage of the legal-tender act was most certainly the greatest blessing ever conferred upon a country, its salvation in the hour of its greatest peril; the people have become attached to it; it is the money of the people, and has served to wean them from the despotic power of gold. They nowhere believe there is a necessity for the destruction of the greenback circulation. They remember that before this contraction policy began, and before this threat of resumption was put in execution, the country was prosperous and the people contented, and that in consequence of its influences almost every enterprise and almost every business man in the country has been literally massacred, and they will not easily believe that this startling change from prosperity to adversity is due to any other than the causes which have always produced precisely the same condition that they now find the country in, namely, a contraction of the currency.

Under precisely the same circumstances England undertook to reduce the volume of her currency fully 50 per cent. to make it possible to redeem the balance in gold. The consequences were the same that we are now experiencing, and no other reason has ever been assigned for it. Why, then, should we attempt to assign any different reason for our difficulties; why talk about overtrading and overproduction as the cause? Some force might have been given to such an argument immediately after the war, when the immense surplus of Army supplies and productions called for by the war was thrown upon the country to encounter the difference in consumption between a state of peace and a state of war; but it must be remembered that ten years of profound peace have transpired, during which trade would, if uninfluenced by any other circumstances, have adjusted itself to the demands of the country.

The experience and sagacity and means of information of the manufacturing classes are such that, understanding about the power of consumption of the country supplied by them, they endeavor to adjust the supply to the consumption. It is for their interest to anticipate the demand as nearly as possible, because a production in excess of the demand gluts the market, and low prices follow, to the injury of the producer, so that in the absence of any stimulating cause, such as prospect of an unusual consumption, there is not likely to be an overproduction sufficient to unsettle the entire business of the country. Uninfluenced by disturbing elements, the ordinary business of the country would in ten years have freed itself from the influences growing out of the war, and have adjusted itself in healthy channels. But we were at the close of the war in just that situation, a heavy foreign debt, trade largely against us, when every effort should have been made to increase our production of exportable articles, so that instead of sending money away with which to pay balances against us, foreign gold might be sent here for that purpose. Now let us bend all our energies and efforts to the accomplishment of that one object, and when we have so increased our products as to satisfy any demand, foreign and domestic, and in addition our products shall accumulate in our warehouses and elevators for want of a remunerative market, it will be time enough to talk of overproduction.

My friend from Massachusetts mournfully suggests "that unless the greenbacks are funded into interest-bearing gold bonds there is no escape from repudiation, because we cannot bear the burdens with which this delusive currency oppresses us." Repudiate with less currency than President Grant pronounced no more than enough for the dullest period of the year and the best the world had ever seen! Pennsylvania once thought of repudiation, but was happily saved such disgrace; the State and the people were bankrupt, and neither paid any debts, because there was no money; just the condition the theory of the contractionists will most assuredly get us into. Now what was done; still further contract the currency? Better than that: paid the debt by the State issuing $3,000,000 in bills of credit a legal tender for all public dues; the people accepted those bills as money, and I am told they circulated freely all over the State, and were accepted in payment of private debts. With it the State paid its creditors, and with its help industry revived throughout the State, and the people in a short time were in the full tide of prosperity, and from that time forward the State progressed rapidly in all the departments of its industry. But suppose a contrary policy had been pursued, and the government had said to the people, "You must stand the pressure a little while longer; a little more want and wrestling with poverty; but be manly and do not complain; things will get down to hard-pan after a while, and you will be all the better for your sufferings." Would that have brought relief to the people, and when? And yet that is just what the resumptionists say to the people now.

Let us for a moment examine the course adopted by France under circumstances precisely similar to those under which this country was forced to issue government paper, and at the close of the war she found herself with a large paper circulation, greater than ever before, which she has not been obliged to redeem at all, but maintains to-day a circulation per capita larger than ours, and her legal-tender notes irredeemable in gold circulate along beside gold with only 2 or 3 per cent. between them; the nation is prospering. productions have largely increased, her exports are largely in excess of her imports, and gold comes to France to settle balances in her favor, and there is to-day four hundred millions in gold in the bank of France. Paper money is legal tender for all dues, public and private; hence she has no use for gold. She paid a thousand millions of dollars of war indemnity to Germany, not in hard gold as Germany expected, but in bills of exchange drawn against her exports to foreign countries, and according to all accounts is more prosperous than at any former period of her history; no talk of contracting her currency. She has now in circulation and in bank, coin and paper, in round numbers $800,000,000. How is it with us, with much less money in fact and less per capita. Our greenbacks are worth fifteen to eighteen per cent. less than gold, our industry paralyzed, our workingmen idle; and if we are to believe what we every day hear from all quarters, from public speakers on both sides and from newspapers in every part of the country, there was never at any time before such general and widely spread distress and embarrassment as now exist. The balance of trade has been largely against us, a large debt held abroad, a Treasury with scarcely a dollar of gold in it, and our paper fifteen to eighteen cents below gold.

This difference between the two countries is so marked and well defined, that there must be a reason for it. It cannot be the result of mere chance. There is a reason, and I think it is found in the fact that when France issued inconvertible paper she made it a legal tender for both public and private debts, received it in payment of all dues to the government, and paid it to all her creditors, and consequently there was no demand for gold. By that process France kept her debt at home, fostered and encouraged her own industries, and by the amount of her exportations she prevented any drain of gold from her dominions and the taxation of her people to pay foreign debts. Why did we not follow her example and profit by her experience? We should have done so, but did not. Our Government refused to make its currency a full legal tender, but discredited it before the world by refusing to receive it in the payment of duties, and declaring that gold alone should be taken in discharge of the interest on the public debt; thereby creating two kinds of currency, a gold currency for the bondholder and a paper currency for the people, the direct effect of which was to depreciate the paper currency and create a new and extraordinary demand for gold. Without this vicious system, with the paper made a legal tender, there would have been no necessity for a single dollar of gold in this country, and the paper would have been worth as much as gold.

There is another distinguishing feature in the policy of the French government, and that is that the Frenchman, by stimulating every possible productive capacity of the people, kept all the wheels of industry in rapid and successful operation, actually paying an export duty to encourage the production of articles of prime importance and necessary to constitute France independent of the whole world; and so successful was she in her policy, that her people paid the enormous war debt in the surplus products they were able to export to foreign countries.

Now, what is the remedy for the currency evils now affecting the country so seriously? Appreciate the value of our paper currency by making it a full legal tender. That done, and the problem of resumption is solved, and it will be able to fulfill all the indispensable uses to which a currency of gold may be applied; because the only possible reason why gold is at a premium or greenbacks at a discount is that the Government by every means in its power has appreciated gold and discredited its own paper. Let us keep the control of the currency in our own hands and not surrender it to the money kings, who are striving to absorb the earnings of industry, and we shall have peace on this question, justice will be established, and the general welfare promoted; prosperity will again revisit our shores, and we shall vindicate the wisdom and superiority of our free institutions before the world.

Republican Success Essential to Legitimate Reform.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN H. BAKER,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 9, 1876,

On the necessity of the success of the republican party in order to secure legitimate reform.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, two years ago the democratic party went before the country on the claim of reform in the civil service, retrenchment in expenditures, and reduction of taxation. They succeeded in electing a large majority of the members of this House and in obtaining control in many States. In the impending presidential campaign the same issue is made prominent in the platforms of their national and State conventions, in the speeches on the floor of Congress, in the public press, and on the stump. From time to time the democratic candidate for the Presidency had given out that the battle-cry of the canvass was to be reform, and in his letter of acceptance he has amplified the same idea, hoping evidently by a mere catch-word to take captive the popular heart. This cry falsely implies that the republican party is opposed to reform. The flaunting of their party banner in our faces inscribed "reform" challenges attention to their record in the past and their practice at the present time. In reform the people demand the genuine article and not a glittering sham.

The character of the last democratic national administration in every element constituting pure, economical, honest, patriotic government was so shameless that no man can be found hardy enough to defend it. Covered with corruption and swarming with peculators from the public Treasury, there was no department of that administration that was not honey-combed with frauds and crimes. It is difficult to determine whether the imbecility and wickedness of the President or the treason fostered and encouraged in the Cabinet and in the Halls of Congress are more calculated to arouse patriotic indignation. The incapacity of that party to retrench expenditures while controlling the national administration is shown by its creation of a debt annually to carry on the Government in time of peace. The expenditures exceeded the revenues as follows:

For the fiscal year ending June 30—
1858	$27,529,904 43
1859	15,584,511 10
1860	7,065,990 56
1861	25,036,714 50
Making the total indebtedness created	75,217,120 59

The public credit had meantime sunk so low that a loan of $25,000,000 was negotiated at a discount of about 15 per cent. below par. Nothing need be added to this naked outline to make the picture of the profligacy, corruption, and treason of the democracy of that day appear in all its naked deformity.

In his letter of acceptance the democratic candidate for Vice-President makes the following charge:

The burdens of the people must also be lightened by a great change in our system of public expense. The profligate expenditure which increased taxation from $5 per capita in 1860 to $18 in 1870 tells its own story of our need of fiscal reform.

The burdens of the people are undoubtedly great, and they ought to be lightened to the utmost by every possible fiscal reform. The republican party has done this in a most remarkable degree, as I shall presently show. The burdens of taxation spoken of by Mr. Hendricks must be national, as he is speaking of the reform to be accomplished in this particular by a national democratic success. Let us recur to official data and see how nearly he speaks the truth. I have before me a recent statement, carefully prepared by the Treasury Department, exhibiting the comparative ordinary expenses of the Government for the years 1860 and 1875. I incorporate the material portions of this statement in my remarks, as follows:

Comparison of the expenditures of 1875 with those of 1860.

Objects of expenditure.	Expenditures for fiscal year 1875.	Deductions of expenditures arising in consequence of the rebellion, 1875.	Expenditures on peace basis, 1875.	Expenditures in 1860.

Deduct items which are not in reality expenditures, but which appear so by reason of the system of book-keeping in practice in the Department			4,172,570 32	1,623,380 34
			69,856,117 77	61,402,408 64
Excess of expenditures of 1875 over 1860			8,453,709 13

The expenses for the year 1876 are less by several millions than they were in 1875, so that for the present fiscal year the expenses of the Government, after deducting the expenses growing out of the war debt and war claims are about the same as in 1860. The above statement shows that the expenses for 1875 exceed those of 1860 by only the sum of $8,453,709.13. This statement, which is entirely authentic and official, shows in detail that the reckless and partisan charges of the democratic vice-presidential candidate are wholly unfounded. This misstatement was knowingly made by Governor Hendricks for bad party purposes. It demonstrates what a moment's reflection must convince any impartial mind is the truth, and that is that the great and overwhelming burden under which our people labor, and which hangs like an incubus on our prostrate industries, is the bitter fruit of a wicked and causeless rebellion. And yet the very men who have nearly wrought our ruin, with an effrontery unparalleled, ask the people to place in their keeping all that is valuable in the present or hopeful for the future.

In 1860 the population of the country was in round numbers 31,000,000. The net ordinary expenses of the Government per capita were $2.04 in currency. In 1875 the population in round numbers was 44,000,000. The ordinary expenses of the Government per capita, after deducting the expenses for which the republican party is not responsible and which cannot be diminished by any party in control of the Government, are $1.70 in currency. Another illustration will show the falsity of the charge made by Governor Hendricks. In 1870 the population was 38,000,000. The taxes at $18 per capita would amount to $684,000,000. The amount actually collected that year was only $411,255,477.21. In 1875 they were reduced to $288,000,051.10, or considerably less than one-half the amount stated by the democratic vice-presidential candidate.

The democratic presidential candidate is equally unfortunate in his attempt to deceive and mislead the people. In his letter of acceptance he says:

The present depression in all the business and industries of the people, which is depriving labor of its employment and carrying want into so many homes, has its principal cause in excessive governmental consumption. Under the illusions of a specious prosperity, engendered by the false policies of the Federal Government, a waste of capital has been going on ever since the peace of 1865, which could only end in universal disaster. The Federal taxes of the last eleven years reach the gigantic sum of $4,500,000,000.

The purpose of this reference is to show the people that all this vast sum has been consumed in carrying on the ordinary functions of the Government.

A report furnished me on request by the Secretary of the Treasury, which I have in my hand, shows that the expenses of the last eleven years ending with June 30, 1876, were as follows:

For the fiscal year ending June 30—
1866	$520,809,416 99
1867	357,542,675 16
1868	377,340,284 86
1869	322,865,277 80
1870	309,653,560 75
1871	292,177,188 25
1872	277,517,962 67
1873	290,345,245 33
1874	287,133,873 17
1875	274,623,392 84
1876	258,459,797 33
Making total amount of expenditures in the last eleven years	3,568,468,675 15

Mr. Tilden, it will be seen, comes within about one thousand millions of having his figures correct. If he had embraced the last twelve years in his statement, it would have been substantially correct as to amount. But to have been entirely accurate he ought to have stated that the sum of $1,031,000,000 was paid out during the fiscal year 1865 to the Army and for the expenses of the last year of the rebellion. Can he never cease upbraiding the republican party for the thousands of millions spent in putting down the rebellion? Would he have had the republican party in 1865 repudiate the more than one thousand millions then due to the gallant defenders of the Republic against a rebellion whose life was prolonged into 1865 by his Chicago peace platform, which declared "the experiment of war a failure?" During the eleven years ending with June 30, 1876, there have been paid out on two single accounts the following amounts:

Interest on the public debt.

For the fiscal year ending June 30—
1866	$133,067,741 69
1867	143,781,591 91
1868	140,424,045 71
1869	130,694,242 80
1870	129,235,498 00
1871	125,576,565 93
1872	117,357,839 72
1873	104,750,688 44
1874	107,119,815 21
1875	103,093,544 57
1876	100,243,271 23
Total interest paid on public debt in the last eleven years..	1,335,144,845 21

The amount paid for pensions.

For the fiscal year ending June 30—
1866	$15,605,352 35
1867	20,936,551 71
1868	23,782,386 78
1869	28,476,621 78
1870	28,340,202 17
1871	34,443,894 88
1872	28,533,402 76
1873	29,359,426 86
1874	29,038,414 66
1875	29,465,216 22
1876	28,257,395 69
Total amount of pensions paid in the last eleven years	296,229,865 96

These two items amount to $1,631,374,711.17. To this must be added war, cotton, and southern claims paid in the last eleven years, at least $250,000,000. This amount of disbursements was made during this period and is directly referable to the rebellion. To all this must be added $622,154,730.59 paid on the public debt up to June 30, 1876. Since then $1,300,000 more has been paid. So that instead of four thousand five hundred millions having been consumed in carrying on the ordinary functions of the Government the sum is less rather than over one thousand million dollars for the whole period of eleven years. The true amount is very nearly $900,000,000. Considering the population, the unsettled condition of the eleven lately seceded States, the necessarily large increase of the public service from the growth of the country and the reconstruction of the South, and the increased pay of our soldiers and sailors, the consumption of taxes for the ordinary expenses of the Government has been certainly less in proportion to the wealth and population than it was under the last democratic administration. The obvious purpose of such grossly partisan misstatements by the democratic presidential and vice-presidential candidates is to impose on the ignorant or unwary, a course which can find its only apology in the desperation of a bad cause.

One more fact in this connection ought to be stated. It will present republican reform in the large and steady reduction of internal-revenue taxes and customs dues since the close of the rebellion in a manner gratifying to every well-wisher of his country. The estimates which I use will be found in the finance report of 1872. On recent application at the Treasury Department, I have received confirmation of their accuracy. These estimates are therefore reliable as well as official, having undergone a double scrutiny.

The reduction of taxation since the close of the war has been as follows:

In internal revenue.

By the act of July 13, 1866	$65,000,000
By the act of March 2, 1867	40,000,000
By the act of February 3, 1868	23,000,000
By the act of March 31, 1868, and July 20, 1868	45,000,000
By the act of July 14, 1870	55,000,000
By the act of June 6, 1872	20,651,000
Making total reduction of internal-revenue taxes	248,651,000

In customs dues.

By the act of July 14, 1870	$29,526,410
By the acts of May 1 and June 6, 1872	31,172,761
Making total reduction in customs dues	60,699,171

The total reduction under these several acts is $309,350,171. The average annual reduction since the war and down to 1875, when the democracy came into absolute control of the House, is $30,935,017.10.

The Constitution invests the House of Representatives with the sole power of originating tax and revenue bills. Hence the democratic party is alone responsible for having allowed a session of nearly nine months to pass without any effective effort to reduce taxation. Revenue reform wisely directed is always needed. The democracy in 1874 pledged themselves to the country to reduce taxation more rapidly and largely than has been done by the republican party. Had the republican party remained in control of the House it would have made large reductions this year, as it has done in years past. This solemn pledge of revenue reform made by the democratic party was only made to be broken. To leave taxation unchanged, and simply cut down appropriations and cripple the Government can bring no relief to prostrate industries. It will simply drain the money from the people and, instead of spending it in carrying on the Government, needless millions will be hoarded in the Treasury and withdrawn from circulation. It will produce financial stringency and distress instead of affording needed relief.

Two propositions have been presented by the democracy to the House. One bill proposes to lay a tax on tea and coffee, which should produce a revenue of say $30,000,000 per annum, to be largely drawn from the laborers of the country. The other bill looked to cutting down, in the interest of the rich, the duties on many articles of luxury of foreign production. These facts exhibit the hollow pretense of the democratic party so far as relates to revenue reform.

The fair inference from Mr. Tilden's letter of acceptance and the known and uniform practice of the democratic party is that the only reform in the civil service will be to turn out honest, experienced, and capable men and women, largely Union soldiers and their widows and orphans, and replace them by a hungry and rapacious horde of democrats largely made up of ex-confederates.

It is claimed, however, that the bloody struggle of the rebellion and their having been kept out of the control of the National Government for the past sixteen years have purged the democratic party of its profligacy and corruption. When or how this miracle has been wrought we are left painfully in ignorance. They assert that such is the fact without proof and boldly demand that the people shall accept their assertion. Let them first do "works meet for repentance." If we beg leave to doubt their conversion and call upon them for proof, we shall only follow the maxims of wisdom and the dictates of experience. Wherever the democratic party has had control since 1860, whether in State or municipal government, it has proved that it has not lost any of its old habits of profligacy and corruption. Its administration of the finances in State, county, and municipal affairs has always and everywhere been characterized by false pretenses of retrenchment and economy. In point of fact it has almost always been extravagant, frequently corrupt, and often criminal. Inasmuch as the democratic candidate for President is a citizen of New York City and has been for nearly a quarter of a century a leading and influential politician in close and intimate personal and political relations with the democratic rulers of that city, we can fairly look to its financial management as a type of the reform which we may expect if the democrats are successful in gaining control of the National Government.

In 1830 the public debt of the city of New York amounted to the sum in round numbers of $900,000, at which figure it stood with small fluctuations until 1836, when it was increased to $1,282,103.58. In the next year it was nearly doubled, and so again the following year; so that in 1839 the debt had reached the sum of $7,126,790. This was still further increased, so that it amounted to $13,316,292.86 in 1842. At this figure it stood about stationary for the next ten years. During the ten years from 1852 to 1862 it was increased to the sum of $21,695,506.83. Then followed six years of moderate democratic extravagance, increasing the debt by some $14,000,000, so that in 1868 the debt amounted to $35,983,647. It was about this period that the high political morals and the reform and economic virtues of Tilden, Tweed, Morrissey, Kelly and other eminent reformers of the Tammany school were most potential in governing that city. In one year the debt sprang up from $35,983,747 in 1868 to $47,691,840 in 1869. In 1870 it had swollen to $73,373,752. In 1871 it amounted to $88,369,386. In 1872 it amounted to $95,582,153. In 1873 it was increased to $106,363,471. In 1874, the last year for which I have the official figures, the debt amounted to the enormous sum of $114,979,970. Thus in nine years under a purely democratic administration the debt of this city had grown from $35,983,647 to $114,979,970, being the gigantic sum of $78,996,323. Before this debt all the debts created under so-called carpet-bag governments in all the lately seceded States sink into insignificance. The debt fastened on that city by the democratic party in nine years exceeds the whole debt contracted in all the States lately in rebellion since the close of the war. The tax per capita in New York was in—

1860	11 99
1870	25 11

The debt per capita was in 1830 $3.82; in 1874 $114.98.

A debt of $115 in round numbers for each man, woman, and child is the legacy of democratic administration in that great city. The people of this country will hardly feel like saying to Tilden and his Tammany democratic friends, "Inasmuch as ye have been faithful over a few things, we will make you ruler over many."

There is one other mode in which the respective claims of the republican and democratic parties to honesty and efficiency in the administration of public affairs may be tested. And I wish to say in passing that the republican party is not ashamed of its record, however much it may blush for the weakness and criminality of some of its members. It does not ask that its past shall be blotted from the page of history and the memory of men. As the majestic sun in our planetary system gives light and heat and life to the teeming millions of the earth, so the republican party has given liberty to a race, saved republican institutions from perishing from among men, and has given fresh hope and heart to struggling humanity everywhere. As there are spots on the disk of the sun, so, as our party is composed of fallible men, there have been errors and short-comings, and doubtless some bad and corrupt men have found their way into public place. But take the history of the republican party for the last sixteen years as a whole, and when the future historian shall chronicle the achievements of the first century of the Republic the loftiest niche on that historic page will be filled with the deeds wrought by that great and patriotic party. Loyal, honest, and faithful in the past, it is the safest guardian for the future of the blood-bought results of the war.

I cannot give place here for the full statement issued by the Secretary of the Treasury June 19, 1876, showing the amount of defalcations and the ratio of losses per $1,000 to the aggregate received and disbursed, arranged in periods of four years each. I have the detailed statement in my hand, and I read only the gross amounts. First I read the amount of losses and defalcations in the collection of the revenues of the Government from all sources.

This table tells its own tale. From a loss and defalcation of $10.17 on each $1,000 of receipts during the last term of Andrew Jackson's administration, the losses and defalcations during the last term of President Grant's administration have reached the unexampled figure of 22 cents on each $1,000 of receipts. While I freely admit that there are serious defects in the civil service of the republican party, its improvement on democratic civil service is great and unparalleled.

These tables show that the officers to whom are intrusted the vast financial interests of the country are possessed of a greater average honesty and skill than any who have been in that service before them. The average losses and defalcations in disbursements on each $1,000 are almost fifty times less than in Jackson's day. In honesty and efficiency this branch of the service which takes charge of the people's money never stood one-twentieth part as high under any democratic administration since 1834 as it does to-day. And yet with a record showing their frauds and corruptions during twenty-six years to have been more than twenty times as great on the average as that of the republican party, with an assurance absolutely amazing, they ask to be put into possession of the Government.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to spend further time in placing the democratic record of the past alongside of the republican record. I wish to bring before the House and the country some facts of more recent occurrence; facts which may well give pause to thoughtful men and impel them to ask, Whither are we tending? These facts are like the little storm-cloud when it first appears upon the sky giving evidence of the coming storm. They show the tendency and purpose at least of the great controlling wing of the democratic party, the southern wing, which gives vitality and power to the national democracy, and which will control, in the future as in the past, that party and its policies. I allude, sir, to the enormous raids that are to be made on the Treasury in the interest of the South. It was to have been expected that with an adverse Senate and Executive and with an impending presidential election the southern democracy would have been prudent enough to have concealed their real purposes. Such, however, is not the fact. The full measure of their demands upon the overburdened tax-payers of the North stands clearly revealed in the bills which southern democrats have introduced and have pending to-day in this Chamber, which are to sleep until they gain control of the Government. When that occurs they will demand their passage. With a solid South they only need forty northern democratic votes to control this House. Who doubts that if the democrats carry the country forty men, like Ephraim, baked only on one side, will be found to aid them.

Let me, Mr. Speaker, call attention to these bills, not in the order of their introduction, but rather with reference to the matter to which they relate.

THE DIRECT-TAX JOB.

The first bill to which I call attention is House bill No. 3145, entitled "A bill to refund certain direct taxes on land collected from citizens in the late insurrectionary States under the act of August 5, 1861." The act of 1861 levied a direct tax of twenty millions and apportioned it, as provided by the Constitution, among the several States according to population. All the States except those in rebellion assumed their quotas and paid them excepting some small balances. The amount apportioned to the eleven insurrectionary States was $5,153,886. When the war closed the collection of this tax in the South began and continued until July, 1866, when Congress passed an act suspending further collection until January 1, 1869. No effort has been made to collect any of this tax since 1866. The amount uncollected is $2,661,776. Not satisfied to be relieved from the payment of this large debt, the South now demands that the Government shall refund the sum of $2,492,110. The reason alleged in the bill is that said taxes "were taken from a people greatly impoverished by the war and wholly unable to pay the same, and that the burden of taxation may be made equal and that all the people alike in said States may be equally relieved by the act of suspension."

Nearly fifteen millions of this direct tax were drawn from the toiling people of the North. The exigency which made this tax necessary involved the loyal North in a debt of nearly two thousand six hundred millions of dollars, the loss of three hundred thousand precious lives, and five hundred thousand more shattered and broken by wounds and disease. Who will equalize their burdens, repay their taxes, make good the losses of life and health and property? Cannot some southern democrat devise some system more equitable and just in its operations than to lay all the losses of the South on the patient back of the North?

THE COTTON-TAX JOB.

Under the provisions of the internal-revenue law there was levied and collected during the years 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868 a tax on raw cotton amounting to the sum of $68,072,388.79. For several years there has been a determined combination to secure the refunding of this tax. The southern democracy is determined to get the amount refunded to their people. A democrat from Georgia introduced a bill (H. R. No. 232) which proposes to "refund the tax to the parties who actually produced the cotton." It is, however, a gigantic job of lobbyists and speculators who have got control at mere nominal figures of nearly the whole of this immense claim. The amount involved makes this a most popular scheme for the lobby ring, and if the democrats carry the election this year the northern laborers may prepare their shoulders for this new burden. The plan proposed by the bill is to issue bonds of the United States in sums of one hundred, five hundred, and one thousand dollars, payable at the Treasury of the United States to bearer at the end of thirty years from date, in gold, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum payable semi-annually in gold. The annual interest on this sum would be $3,403,619. In thirty years the amount of interest paid would be $102,108,570; thus making the entire amount, principal and interest, to be taken from the tax-payers $170,180,958. Four-fifths of this vast scheme of plunder would fall upon the laborers of the North.

CLAIMS FOR USE AND OCCUPATION OF PROPERTY.

There are two other schemes pending before the House and awaiting a democratic victory to carry them to success whose gigantic proportions appall the mind with their vastness. These schemes are brought forward with the settled purpose on the part of the southern democracy to carry them at the earliest moment. The first of these two bills to which I refer is House bill No. 2364, "directing compensation to be allowed for the use and occupation of property by the United States during the late war." It authorizes the Secretary of War "to allow reasonable compensation to all citizens of the United States for the use and occupation of their property by the United States Army, or any part thereof, during the late civil war." It provides "that the affidavit of the claimant, supported by the competent testimony of any reputable citizen, shall be sufficient proof to establish the fact of the use and occupation of such property by said Army."

It will be observed that the act is not confined to loyal citizens, but it in express terms embraces all citizens, whether loyal or disloyal. It gives every man, woman, and child who owned any property which was used or occupied by the Army during the war a claim on the Treasury for the reasonable value of such use and occupation. The whole South was used and occupied by our armies for four years, and now it is proposed to compel the loyal men of the North, who spent more than five thousand millions in treasure and three hundred thousand lives to crush out the rebellion, to pay more than a thousand million dollars in addition for having dared to use and occupy the South while fighting to preserve the Union! There is no constitutional amendment forbidding the payment of such claims. They now confront us here in this Chamber; and if the democratic party succeed, the patient laborers of the North must bow their backs while their southern masters lay on this load.

The symmetry of this scheme of democratic plunder would not be complete without another bill to cover personal property. It is not wanting. An Arkansas member introduced a bill (H. R. No. 553) "to facilitate the adjustment and settlement of claims of citizens of the United States for stores and supplies taken or furnished during the rebellion for the Army of the United States, and for other purposes." This bill provides that—

> All citizens of the United States having claims against the United States for stores or supplies taken or furnished during the rebellion for the use of the Army of the United States, including the use and loss of vessels or boats while employed in the service of the United States, may institute suit against the United States for the adjustment and recovery of such claims, &c.

This bill, like the preceding one, is intended for the sole benefit of those who were engaged in the wicked attempt to destroy the life of the nation. The vastness of the scheme contemplated by these two bills almost passes belief.

We have, Mr. Speaker, a basis which will enable us to approximate with some degree of accuracy their amount. An act was passed shortly after the close of the war creating the court of southern claims commission, and giving it jurisdiction to receive and adjudicate claims for property taken, occupied, or destroyed by our armies where the claimant would swear to his constant loyalty during the rebellion. A reasonable estimate of the number and amount of the claims under the two bills I am discussing may be formed by taking the number and amount of southern claims filed by claimants who have sworn to their loyalty. The number of such claims is 22,298. The total amount of such claims now filed is $50,258,150.

It is safe to say that the claims of disloyal claimants will average as much in amount as those of loyal claimants. I think the disloyal people of the South embraced the great body of the wealthy and educated, so that their claims would be likely to average more rather than less than those filed by southern loyalists. But let us put their average at the same amount. It is also safe to say that there were fifty times as many disloyal as there were loyal men who suffered loss by the war of the rebellion. On this basis, and I submit that it is a reasonable one, the amount of these two schemes of plunder will reach the enormous sum of $3,012,907,500! Can you trust the southern democracy and their northern allies to keep this fearful burden from your shoulders? In war they were united in heart; in peace they are not divided.

There are one hundred and forty-two other bills seeking relief for the South whose amount only reaches a few millions of dollars. These are too petty in the face of these grander schemes of plunder to demand more extended comment. Let us recapitulate these greater schemes which I have mentioned:

The direct-tax job	$2,492,110
The cotton-tax job	68,072,388
The war-loss job	3,012,907,500
Total amount of jobs	$3,983,471,998

With such vast schemes of plunder to call them together, the army of lobbyists, rings, and political sharpers who will infest the capital under democratic rule will be thicker than the lice and more voracious than the locusts of Egypt. This is only one of the phases of public plunder under the sounding name of reform to which the present corrupt and profligate democracy invite the country. To that great and patriotic party which saved the national life, enfranchised a race, restored national honor and financial credit alone can the people of the country to-day look for that genuine reform and wise, patriotic, and loyal government which shall add new and enduring luster to the glories of the past.

Reciprocity with Canada.

SPEECH OF HON. HENRY L. PIERCE,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 9, 1876,

On the question of reciprocity with Canada.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, the recommendation made by the minority of the Committee on Commerce does not call for an elaborate discussion of this question. We simply ask for the appointment of a commission to investigate and ascertain on what basis a treaty of reciprocal trade for the mutual benefit of the people of the United States and the Dominion of Canada can be negotiated, and to report the result to the President of the United States. There is nothing in this proposition which in any way commits the Government beyond a mere examination and a report of the facts; and in view of the opinions expressed upon this question by the principal merchants and manufacturers throughout the country, I cannot believe that the House will refuse its assent. If it should be found impossible to devise a scheme which will inure to our benefit then we shall be justified in declining to enter into negotiations; but until that is shown those who represent the business interests of the country will never be satisfied with the present condition of things.

I cannot conceive of any serious opposition to this measure except from those who have special or personal interests to protect, which, in their opinion, would be injuriously affected by any reciprocal trade relations, and who, therefore, are not willing even that the subject should be considered, for fear that a good case may be made out in favor of reciprocity.

To show the views upon this question of the most enterprising and public-spirited business men I cannot do better than refer briefly to the proceedings of the national board of trade, which is composed of delegates from the trade and commercial organizations in all of our principal cities—from Portland to San Francisco, from New Orleans to Milwaukee.

At the meeting in New York in 1872 a committee, which had been appointed at the annual meeting in the previous year to confer with a deputation from the dominion board of trade in regard to reciprocal trade relations with Canada, recommended the adoption of a resolution instructing the executive council "to memorialize Congress to make an appropriation for the appointment of a commission to act in conjunction with the State Department in negotiating a treaty with Great Britain for reciprocal trade with the Dominion of Canada on a broad, comprehensive, and liberal basis, which shall also include the enlargement of the Canadian canals by the government of Canada and the right of American vessels to navigate said canals under the same conditions as are imposed upon Canadian vessels."

The subject was discussed very fully and intelligently, and the resolution was adopted without a dissenting voice. Some who took part in the debate were strong protective-tariff men; others were in favor of free trade, but they were all united in support of a proposition for reciprocal trade with Canada.

Mr. Taylor, of Cincinnati, who reported the resolution, said:

> The old treaty was confined to the free interchange of the products of the soil, the forest, the ocean, and the mine. Our Canadian friends say that they think their government would be prepared to admit a variety of American manufactures, perhaps not the finest textile fabrics, but some of the coarser manufactures, and that the treaty would have a much wider scope than the one which prevailed for ten or eleven years and which was advantageous to both countries. In addition to this trade which they offer us and this opportunity to sell certain of our manufactures to 4,000,000 people, they are ready to enlarge their canals and to give the use of them to American vessels on the same terms as those imposed upon Canadian vessels. Now I do not believe, as some persons seem to do here, that cheap transportation is the chief end of man, but I do believe that it is a matter of very great importance, and if you can lessen the cost of transporting a bushel of wheat from the Northwest to the seaboard, you put just so much more money in the farmer's pocket, and when the producers—because all wealth comes out of the soil—are amply remunerated then the country must prosper.

Mr. McCrea, of Chicago, said:

> While I believe in protecting our young and struggling industries until such time as they can compete with the industries of older countries, I believe it is time now that Canadian lumber should come into American territory free of duty. Our lumber forests are dwindling very fast; they are disappearing year by year. Go to the prairies and see who buys the lumber; see the farmer who brings in a load of corn sell it for about $8, when the same weight of the most common lumber he can buy will cost him from twenty to twenty-five dollars. On those prairies there is not lumber enough on a thousand acres to make a whip-stock, and everything which shelters the farmer or his flocks has to be brought from Canada, and is made to pay a duty, or a bonus must be paid to our home manufacturers.

Mr. Wetherill, of Philadelphia, said:

> I am certainly in favor of reciprocal trade. It is purely a question of self-interest, and that after all is the governing motive of all business men in practical business operations. We want something of Canada and Canada wants something of us. There are disadvantages on the one side and disadvantages on the other side This board has not the time to go into the details of the work, and we want a commission sharp enough, and careful enough, and prudent enough to take care of the interests of the United States.

I might quote at much greater length from the remarks of delegates from other sections of the country, but what I have given is sufficient to show the spirit in which the subject was then discussed.

In 1874, as is well known, the draught of a new treaty was submitted by the Executive to the Senate for ratification; but the subject had not been properly investigated by a commission, as we now propose that it shall be, and consequently there were some details not satisfactory either to our own people or to the Canadians. It was rejected; and public opinion sustained the Senate in its rejection.

At the last annual meeting of the national board, held in Philadelphia in June, 1875, the following resolution submitted by the Board of Trade of Chicago was discussed and unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That Congress be memorialized and urged to authorize the early appointment by the President of the United States of a commission of not less than five merchants and business men, familiar with the subject, to confer on the part of the United States, with a like commission on the part of the Dominion of Canada, on the subject of a treaty for reciprocal trade and commercial relations between the United States and the Dominion of Canada; said joint commission to be authorized on the part of their respective governments to suggest and recommend the details of provisions for such treaty, subject to the concurrence of the respective Governments of the United States, the Dominion of Canada, and of Great Britain.

Speaking to the resolution, Mr. McCrea, of Chicago, said:

There are many advantages which might be derived from such a treaty, and there are no substantial benefits which would be lost. New England, probably, would secure the right to the Canadian fisheries and cheap coal from Nova Scotia. The West and the Northwest would secure increased transportation facilities, and, what is more to us at present, access to those vast forests of pine and hard wood that lie on the north and east shores of Lake Huron, which we so much need at the present time in the settlement of our prairies and the reduction of the ores of Lake Superior and other mining regions. These would be but a few of the substantial results that must come from a treaty of that kind, and being committed to such hands as is contemplated by this resolution, will commend itself to the good judgment and honest purpose of the people of both continents.

This subject has also been discussed very fully at the annual meetings of the Dominion board of trade; and in looking over the reports of those discussions I have been impressed with the spirit of fairness and liberality which characterized the views of the leading merchants in that province. At the meeting in Ottawa, on the 21st of January last, the board adopted a motion—

That it is very desirable that a treaty of reciprocity with the United States on a comprehensive, liberal, and fair basis should be obtained, and that in the opinion of the board the initiatory steps thereto ought to come from the United States, as it was by their action that the old treaty was abrogated.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that under the circumstances the initiative in this matter devolves upon us; and I trust that to the extent here proposedit will be taken.

Free Schools—Are they in Danger? If so, from what Sources?

SPEECH OF HON. HENRY W. BLAIR,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 29, 1876.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 748) introduced by Hon. GILBERT C. WALKER, of Virginia, to apply the proceeds of public lands to the education of the people—

Mr. BLAIR said:

Mr. SPEAKER: This bill, lacking some useful safeguards, is substantially a measure prepared by Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR and passed by the House of Representatives of the Forty-second Congress on the 8th day of February, 1873, by a nearly solid republican majority, against the bitter and almost unanimous opposition of the democratic members of the House. The customary arguments employed by that party against the power of the nation, as such, to assert its sovereignty and its right to live and to be and to exercise the necessary functions of growth and self-defense whenever the interests of the nation in their massiveness and grandeur seem as a mighty whole to preponderate over the authority and supremacy of its subdivisions, known as the States, were urged with great vehemence to defeat this most emphatically beneficent measure and to protect the consolidated ignorance and prejudice of the country, which are the basic elements of the falsely styled democratic party of our times, in their secure position as the enemies of popular education and the destroyers of free schools.

In this Congress an honorable democratic carpet-bagger, now from Virginia, has had the temerity, and I may be allowed to add, if he will consent to receive the homage of an humble member from his own native North, the intelligent and manly and patriotic independence to introduce and, with the co-operation of his republican associates upon the committee, to advocate upon the floor of this House the cause of the common school. It is a hopeful sign; yet the gentleman well knows that he is identified, in political action, with that great party which, in the section of our country to which he has transported the elevated and inextinguishable impulses of the early home of the town meeting and of the common school, has from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, acquired and maintained its power by suppressing freedom of speech and of the press, and by prohibiting under penalties, proscription, mob violence, and death the education and consequent general diffusion of intelligence, happiness, prosperity, and power among the whole people of the land.

But, sir, I welcome the fact that even a democratic carpet-bagger (note that he was a carpet-bagger, however—the South is under great obligations to carpet-baggers) has dared to make his record in favor of free schools, and the enactment of a law which will have some tendency to promote their prosperity, (although as the bill gives, and I am glad of it, most of the proceeds of the lands to the South,) there is method in this idiosyncrasy, as a most hopeful omen, and ardently pray for the day when the native and ruling public men of the South, whose desperate warfare upon this primal institution of the Republic, during all the vicissitudes of the century, has been her chief curse, shall recognize the great truth that liberty is born only in the mangers of God's poor, cradled in the common school, and made mighty and perpetual by the exercise of a suffrage unrestricted by color, race, and condition in life, and universal as the impress of His image who hath made of one blood all the nations of the earth. And although the passage of this bill can cost the southern leaders no sacrifice of principle or policy, and therefore involves them in no embarrassment in waging their home warfare upon schools, yet I shall be heartily glad if the hope of political capital, or any other motive shall compel the passage of this bill at the present session.

I am one of those who have no faith, no hope in the future of this country only so long and so far as the people are both intelligent and upright; nor is it possible to preserve the honesty and simple virtues of republicanism without the means of early mental discipline are provided for all; and if necessary their use must be made compulsory by the successive generations, during the tender and impressible years of childhood and youth. Honesty and sincerity are consistent with the most dangerous prejudices and the most cruel and nefarious purposes, in public and private life. No man is fit to be a sovereign—as sovereigns we all are in theory—unless he has the power to think continuously and to reason consecutively, and is able to acquire and has acquired the common knowledge which surrounds him pertaining to economic and political affairs. If his powers are disciplined, and he knows the facts he will reason from correct premises, and his moral sense or conscience will obey the dictates of reason. And thus a sound morality must and will exist as the offspring and inseparable consequence and companion of intelligence and disciplined mental powers. This is primary truth so universally conceded that I shall be accused of wasting time in its statement. Yet I believe that wise statesmanship often recurs to general principles, and that there is no better reading for a legislator, and for the people themselves, who are the primary law-givers of the land, than the eloquent and elevated sentiments of the fathers, as they are embodied in the grand though simple bills of rights and earlier constitutions and declarations, which have come down to us from the resplendent luminaries who live eternal in the horizon of our history.

Our system of government is based upon the necessary position that knowledge is power. Government itself is only another name for power; it is the supreme power in the State. That power which controls nations must be either brute power or intelligent power. We are compelled to choose between these forms, or rather principles of control. We have learned through the sad records of six thousand years of almost universal tyranny and misery, that no free government is long perpetuated, unless its force is distributed among all individuals, or unless their essential rights are preserved and protected in constitutions or customs, which constitute iron restrictions upon the encroachments of the executive power of the State. We have learned that the tyranny of a mob or of an ignorant multitude is far worse than all the possible excesses of a single despot. We are thus driven to the absolute necessity of making the controling element of our Government universal intelligence and morality which results from it, or of ultimately yielding up our system of universal suffrage—that is, the distribution of sovereignty to all—and the adoption of the despotic theory of government. I do not mean that there is not more or less of freedom and security to the rights of men in forms of government where the ballot is either unknown or is rarely exercised by the people.

Arbitrary power is oftentimes partially dethroned and placed in subjection to some great, broad limitation, in accordance with which alone will the people consent that the reigning power exist at all. Such was the grand achievement which wrenched the great charter from the unwilling hands of King John at Runnymede, and other similar victories of popular over regal authority, which are embodied and are perpetually active in the constitution of England, and other limited monarchies of the world. But what I mean is this, that our system, being based upon the universal distribution of the sovereignty among all the individual men of the nation, and that power once distributed necessarily remaining so, until revolution collects it again and vests sovereignty in an aristocracy or in a single despot, each man must be qualified by disciplined reason, virtue, and knowledge for the correct exercise of the power which is vested in him, or he is unfit to possess it; and it must logically follow either that he and such as he must surrender it or that by the gradual spread of ignorance and incompetency to govern universal sovereignty will surrender to the control of the few who do possess that knowledge, which, directed for selfish and despotic ends, enables them to triumph and riot in the enslavement and miseries of mankind.

Sir, the one first indispensable thing is the power to think, and whatever people has that power, and most of it, will be most free. Virtue results from it, because virtue is the child of conscience, and a safe conscience must be instructed by intelligence. The common school, then, is the basis of freedom, and the system is an absolute condition precedent, to the spread and perpetuity of republican institutions throughout the country and the world. Ignorance is slavery. No matter what are the existing forms of a government, ignorance will reduce them to the one form of despotism as surely as gravity will bring the stone to the earth and keep it there. Knowledge is liberty, and no matter what the forms of government, knowledge generally diffused will carry liberty, life, and power to all men, and establish universal freedom so long, and only so long, as the people are universally made capable of its exercise by universal intelligence. It is a fundamental error to think that freedom is simply the exercise of one's rights. Freedom is the power to exercise them. Freedom is sovereignty. It is not mere happiness; it is the power to command the conditions of happiness. The veriest tyrant might permit his slaves to possess more of the actual material comforts and fruitions of life, than could be commanded by the free spirit of an unconquerable people; but it is only a universally intelligent people who can know its rights, and knowing dare to maintain them.

The centennial year of the Republic is a fitting time to examine our actual condition. The process is necessary. It is of an importance transcending all questions which relate to finance, and internal and foreign or party policy. It is an examination of the heart of the Republic, of the sources of its life.

Of what use is it to raise, discipline, and embattle armies, if the blood of the Republic itself is corrupted and she must ultimately fall, perhaps under the blows of her own military enginery, controlled by an ambitious and conquering usurper? Why vex the seas with our navies, gallant and invincible, if they are only to spread the fame of his power, where the ensign of the Republic once typified and vindicated the universal rights of man? Why burden a people with taxation, why extort revenues from prostrate industries to eke out the life of the institutions of America, if they are already struck with the palsy of increasing and remediless decay?

Questions of taxation and of the appropriation of revenues in the administration of the Government are highly important, and the people do well to examine closely the conduct of their servants, both as to the purposes for which their money is used and the fidelity of its expenditure. A pure and upright civil service, the contrivance and introduction of a system which shall by its power of selection of the best men for office, and by its stability as an institution of the country, resist and survive the assaults and fluctuations of party greed and aggrandizement, is a matter of great concern to the American people. Whatever relates to the financial interests of the Government and of the people imperatively challenges our attention.

The question of immigration from the Orient, over the Pacific, to the young Commonwealths of the West, and the indefinite increase and possible numerical supremacy of a people who may either absorb our domain without assimilation with our body-politic, or by their ignorance and vice debauch and degrade our countrymen and our institutions, is a mighty problem, looming upon us like a portentous cloud and demanding solution.

Shall our commercial relations with the countries north and south of us be enlarged, and shall the channels of internal transportation be multiplied and improved; shall our foreign policy be timid and retiring, like a bashful boy, or firm and just, and if necessary aggressive? All these and many other great questions press constantly upon us for that intelligent consideration which alone can result in right action; and the like of these are ordinarily the absorbing issues before the people. But such questions are all of secondary importance, and depend upon others, the answer to which is fundamental whenever and however they are raised.

This generation has solved one such fundamental question. The principle asserted itself, as a principle always will assert itself, that this country could not exist permanently "half free and half slave;" and the irrepressible conflict went on until negro slavery, the joint sinful creation of the North and of the South, was abolished in the tremendous struggle of arms and its crimes were expiated in the blood of a million of our precious sons.

But, sir, the principle involved in that contest was the same which we have already considered; shall freedom be universal, or in other words, shall the sovereignty be vested in all men who live under its flag? The ignorance of vast masses had made them weak. Cupidity and the love of ease and power had enslaved them, because they were weak. It will always be thus. It is human nature. But human nature, as it becomes intelligent, will know its rights; it will resist oppression, and as God is just, the avenger cometh.

I believe, sir, that we are approaching another crisis which involves the existence of the Republic. It is in itself capable, but not sure, of peaceful solution. I believe that now we are rapidly nearing the time when the American people will vote directly upon the question, Shall the common-school system, which is under God the source and defense of American liberty, continue to exist? I believe it to be the great underlying question which is involved in the pending presidential election. I do not refer to the sectarian aspect of the subject at all. This country may be only too thankful for any influence which will educate, by increasing the power to think and get knowledge, whether it comes from priest or infidel or saint. A blow struck at the unity, and independence, and complete, unsectarian impartiality of the public-school system, by any man or sect or party, is a blow at our freedom, but not necessarily fatal; and wherever there is nothing better, in the name of liberty, let all those who will, build up any institutions, which make war upon ignorance and develop, however imperfectly, the souls of men.

I would gladly see the Constitution of the country, and of every State, so amended that the common school shall be forever cleansed and protected from all sectarian bias and influence, but I believe that we are now menaced by a more serious danger to our free schools than any which arises from the efforts of a religious sect, however threatening such efforts may be; and further, that all necessity for such an amendment to our Constitution, which I admit to be great, arises from the alliance of effort, between sectarianism and one of our great political parties. That party embodies and organizes all the elements of war upon our common-school system, and the spirit of sectarianism is only one of the influences which it absorbs. Sectarianism is the Hessian, but the real war is between the malign forces of arbitrary power and tendency, which are native to the democratic party as it is controlled to-day, and the spirit of universal liberty, as developed and fostered by the common school. I do not mean to be understood that the democratic party does not contain vast numbers of men who are as patriotic and intelligent, and as strong friends to universal education as any American citizen can or need to be, or that in many States and localities its action as a party is not friendly to the education of the people; but I do mean to say that everywhere it is behind its great opponent, the republican party, in its devotion to the interests of education, and that as a national party, compared with that opponent, and as now controlled, and sure to be controlled in the near, and probably in the remote future, it is the foe of the common school; that its triumph at the polls is the chief danger which now threatens American liberty; and that it is so, because its triumph is the temporary, if not permanent, victory of caste power, which will improve its renewed opportunity everywhere in the country, and especially in the South, which is still the great battle-ground of political ideas, to strengthen and perpetuate itself, in its only possible way, which is by maintaining and increasing the political weakness of the great body of the people, upon whose ignorance its own supremacy is impregnably built. Is it not a matter of history that the democratic party has been the machine of slavery for at least a generation? In what other political party are now to be found the everliving influences which degrade and enslave mankind? These influences have in the republican party their natural foe. Its birth was rebellion against them. Its career has been one stern battle, even unto blood, against the spirit and institutions of arbitrary power. That party is the only effectual champion of freedom in this country to-day. If defeated and deprived permanently of power, the days of the Republic are numbered.

Let us examine this matter more closely, for if these assertions are untrue they are terribly unjust. No other charge can be made against any party so serious and, if false, so calumnious as that it is the foe of liberty, or even that it is not her best friend. And here and now I denounce the charge, sometimes made against northern men, that in the examination of this subject any spirit but one of the most catholic good-will toward all individuals and sections of the country, consciously influences my head or my heart. I believe in the honesty, integrity, and patriotism, blinded though in many respects I think they be, of the representatives of southern sentiment upon this floor. I believe in the honesty and patriotism of all large masses of men. They always design to do right. There has been no great war, either of ideas, or of arms, or of both, in which the combatants participated by their own consent, unless each side believed itself to be right; and by their motives must all individuals be judged and rewarded or condemned. I believe that many an honest and chivalrous soul has laid down his life in the cause of oppression and outrage, to whom the infinite God of justice and love has extended the welcome, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." But no such toleration can be extended to wrong principles. Upon them the largest philanthropy and the broadest comprehensiveness of view will wage the most implacable war. Only the man who, watching through the retributions of history, has been taught the inflexible nature of the principles which God has made, but whose operation He never suspends nor turns aside, can fully separate the cause from its supporter and destroy the one while he preserves the other. It is in this spirit that I would consider my main proposition, namely: the national democratic party, as now controlled and likely to be in the near and probably in the remote future, is the enemy of the common-school system of America.

The first question, then, which arises is, how is the democratic party now controlled, and how is it likely to be controlled, in the near and probably in the remote future? To this question an answer is patent to every man who can call the roll of States. The great mass of the party, nearly its entire organized strength, as far as control of the Government is concerned, is now and must remain in the Southern States, and in that element of southern society which was the confederacy, and in which the tendencies, prejudices, and principles that created the confederacy, are still the vehement motive power. At the North the democratic power is subordinate. Whenever it carries an election it is not from its own strength, but through the weakness or crimes of its antagonists. Whenever public conscience is aroused by an appeal to the underlying principles which control the public judgment and sway the popular heart, the democratic party is as a reed shaken in the wind, and it falls prostrate before the indignant wrath of a free and virtuous people, as did the Dagon Tweed, upon the dishonored threshold of Tammany Hall. Here and there is a great and justly honored name which remains in the organization to carry on the work of purification within the party; but with all their great powers and indefatigable efforts to make brick without straw, they are powerless to cure the deep-seated leprosy of the organization to which they belong, and from which the masses of the North are emancipated. But they carry occasionally a northern State; and with the South reclaimed by the agency of violence and fraud to its ancient allegiance and substantially a unit, these fifteen States do and will enable the democracy to renew its war upon the age in which we live and the liberties of mankind. What would this great party be without the South united upon the issues of the war? It could not live through one session of Congress nor survive another general election. And why is the South united? Why does she not divide upon industrial, economic, and local issues as do the Northern States? She has the same diversity of interests as they. The growing of cotton at the South, is no more an exclusive industry than that of grain at the West. New domestic policies are pressed upon her attention, and she has no reason for combination as a section but the promptings of the old spirit and affinities which produced the war. Tilden captures the convention and the nomination and the mass of the democratic electoral vote, if not its entirety, when he has received the endorsement of the ex-confederate power of the South.

What is there to the majority of this House of Representatives, if you exclude the leading spirits of the confederacy from the Capitol? They could not even adjourn. Who constitute the never-failing element of the democracy in the Senate? But it is idle to waste time in proving that the South is the backbone of the democratic party. Should these southern leaders, in good faith, accept the principles which conquered at Appomattox, what would be left of the democratic party? To ask this question is to answer it: nothing. It could not even die, with a respectable demonstration. If this is so, and if the democratic party must conquer, if at all, by the restoration of southern supremacy in this country, it becomes at once the vital question to the American people, whether that party is still controlled by the spirit of caste—that spirit which wars upon freedom from necessity, since one of them must die. Upon this point the evidence is overwhelming.

First, she sends the same men to the national councils who represented, and because they represented, and were in their own persons, the southern cause in the legislative hall, the cabinet, the forum, and the bloody field. Coke has just been elected to the Senate from Texas, because he was a violent foe to the Government and people of the United States, while Hancock, the pacific native southerner, his able and statesmanlike competitor, was defeated because he refused to swear allegiance to the confederacy, and rend the flag of his country. In public speech General Hancock claimed the election, because he was true to his country; and as a public reproof he was defeated by the sworn electors of Texas upon the very ground that neither in time of war nor in this time of false peace was nor is he the true representative of his people and State. The brilliant and philosophical Representative from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] elected as a true representative of ultra, though more politic, southern opinion, ventures in his place on this floor to denounce the crime of murder in appropriate terms, and although he tempers his disclaimer with countercharges against the North, yet because this Hamburgh massacre was committed to promote southern success at the polls, and in pursuance of the policy, by and through which, power has been recovered in every southern State but one, judging from the tone of the Mississippi press, even LAMAR is already almost an alien in the house of his friends, and only the success of the republican party at the North can save to the country the possibilities of good which lie in this man, so misunderstood alike by political friend and foe. There is to-day from the late confederate army military ability enough in the House of Representatives of this country to give competent leadership to 500,000 men; and there are in the State of Mississippi alone 75,000 men who openly drill as in time of war in every county and almost every town all over the State, skilled soldiery armed with the latest pattern of the most deadly rifles of modern times, and officered by men who know war, and how to make it. Thus is the peace preserved and elections carried in Mississippi and in other States. Order reigns in Warsaw, and, except where electioneering murder is required to conquer another republican State, "they make a desert and call it peace."

We have no reason to wonder at these things; they are to be expected; yet they are none the less deplorable in their causes and consequences. Why should it not be so? Why will it not continue to be so, unless the strong arm of power, wielded by the gigantic force of the public opinion of the country, and voiced in the next election, prevents? The nature of southern society cannot be broken up in four years' war. It is not in human nature to change so suddenly. The constitution of the soul does not thus readily yield. The men who are what they are, because nature and circumstances have made them such, cannot be thus easily reconstructed even if they would. It is impossible. I had almost said it is unmanly that their hearts should suddenly gush with tenderness toward the men and influences which have, in the hands of God, destroyed their power and crushed their half-barbaric form of civilization. I tell you that those hearts do not gush any. It is folly for the northern mind to befool itself with the hope that this generation, or their children, and it may be even their children's children, will ever kiss the hand that smote them. I am not sure that I could, were I one of them; and one cannot help respecting, even when most determined to crush, that stubborn devotion of the soul which still prays and works for the success of the lost cause, by restoring the old supremacy of class and capital over the labor, both white and colored, which lies helpless, under guard of the serried ranks of the white-liners of these Southern States. Consider for a moment how this must be if the democratic party—that is, if the ex-confederate element of the South—succeeds at the next election.

The essence of the institution of slavery was ignorance; therefore, laws were enacted and enforced and customs established in conformity with the spirit of the institution.

The education of the black, even when a freedman, was prohibited by law and the infliction of severe pains and sometimes of even savage cruelties. Religious assemblies could be held only under the surveillance of the whites. The great mass of the whites, not belonging to the landed aristocracy, were coupled with the slaves and were merely a substratum or lower order, almost like the Helots of Sparta, upon which the dignity, fortune, and supremacy of the ruling class were supported and perpetuated. Political power was wholly in the hands of three hundred thousand men, who owned and controlled the soil and the labor of the South, and from their own ranks, or by the designation of their class, all the incumbents, emoluments, and positions of power were selected and filled. Speech and the press were dumb, unless subservient. The confidential intercourse of the mails of the General Government was violated under the forms of legal usurpation. Religion came to the rescue and proved the divinity of the accursed institution; and thus all the elements of aristocratic tyranny, even to chains upon the soul, were combined to preserve and intensify that ignorance, without which the fabric of their oppressive power would have fallen in a day. The common school would have peaceably destroyed the institution of slavery in five years at any time since its introduction upon our soil. These false ideas were universally taught, and this policy cherished and enforced, for two generations. There could be but one result. The mental and moral constitution of both races and all conditions was deeply affected. The lower orders felt and believed in their inferiority, while the dominant class, in all sincerity, assumed superiority as an axiom, and its exercise as an inalienable right. Conscientiously believing in their divine right to control, as they did control with despotic sway, the whole structure and all the interests of society, how could these kings become suddenly converted into lambs of republicanism, by the harsh agency of war? Their mental and moral constitution could not be thus suddenly and violently reconstructed. The spirit might be overwhelmed, but no Anglo-Saxon having inherited and tasted the delights of dominion could ever truthfully claim that force had converted him into a genuine republican. It is idle to expect that the old instinct for power can be instantly suppressed by the voluntary effort of the men who were first the slave-holding oligarchy, then the fighting confederacy, and now are the body, and brains, and leadership, of the democratic party. The faintest degree of political philosophy will convince any man that this must be true. It is no disparagement, but rather is it honorable to the stamina of our southern brethren, that this is so. No men ever fight with such desperation and resource for the preservation and, when lost, for the recovery of power as an aristocracy. I think that is a lesson of history. It cannot be then, in the nature of things, that the leopard has changed his spots any more than the Ethiopian his skin, in consequence of the war.

It would be reasonable then to conclude that these southern democrats are plotting the recovery within the Union—where they mean, not merely "to stay," but to rule—of the essential elements of that superiority which they lost by forcibly withdrawing from it. I do not mean that they will seek to restore the form of slavery, certainly not for many years, but its substance they may and mean to seize by preserving the intellectual degradation and consequent subjection of the ignorant mass below them, while they are freed from the burdens, which a due regard to the preservation of their property compelled them to bear, when slavery was established or recognized, as one of the institutions of the State. And if they have this purpose, there is only one way in which they can possibly accomplish it, and that is by the destruction or the enfeeblement of the common school. Knowledge will destroy their supremacy and therefore they must destroy knowledge. Now it must be remembered, that I am not claiming that they have or can fully accomplish this end. Counteracting influences of invincible power are in operation, and whatever may become of the negro, the southern white yeomanry will some time be republican. I only assert, and it is a statement of direful gravity, that the energies of these men are desperately enlisted to destroy, or at least retard the development of, the common-school system, which alone can confer capacity upon citizenship. And it is the solemn interrogatory of this campaign, Shall the Republic transfer the tremendous power of the national administration into the hands of those, who, by the destruction of the common schools, would in twenty years make a republican form of government impossible?

I ask attention, first, to the evidence which follows in regard to the great mass of ignorance and absence of the means of popular education in this country, and particularly in the South, where the caste power is predominant, and, second, to the evidence demonstrating the settled purpose of that power to substantially destroy the common schools.

The results of the census of 1870 in regard to the condition of popular education in the whole country are full of warning and demonstrate the necessity of the greatest vigilance and effort, in the North as well as in the South, in order to preserve the schools and even the present ratio of intelligence to ignorance; and I wish first to invite the earnest attention of the House and of the country to statistics of a more general nature, compiled from the census returns, and which, in my judgment, demonstrate the truth that the greatest dangers environ the future of this Republic; dangers, all the more formidable, because of our centennial complacency, resulting, it may be, from our pleasant habit of using the American eagle only for screaming purposes, and of comparing ourselves with ourselves, which good authority declares to be not wise.

These tables I have taken in part from the census report, and in part have myself carefully compiled, from data therein given.

THE ACTUAL ILLITERACY OF THE COUNTRY.

There are in the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Wisconsin, Illinois, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, and Kansas an aggregate of 1,354,205 illiterate persons over ten years of age. In the Pacific States and in the Territories there are 102,594. In the Southern States there are 4,187,735, distributed as follows:

	Census returns.	Thirty-three per cent. increase.	Total population.
Delaware	23,100	30,800	125,015
Maryland	135,495	180,660	788,894

Texas	221,512	298,682	818,579

These census returns are made up from the admissions of the persons themselves, and careful examination leads Horace Mann to estimate the real number to be at least 33 per cent. greater than the figures of any given census enumeration; and the experience of educators has led to the universal adoption of the same rule. Even then the figures, however black, are too flattering, for very many have such trifling ability to read and write as to be practically incapable of the acquisition of knowledge from books.

There is thus a total of actual illiterates over ten years of age in this country of	7,524,712
In the Northern and Northwestern States, (of whom a large percentage are of foreign birth)	1,804,273
In the Pacific States and in the Territories	136,772
In the Southern States and District of Columbia, (nearly all natives)	5,573,646
By the same census the total population of these divisions was—

There are in the whole country 2,052,000 ignorant women, most of whom are or may become mothers of children and trainers of families.

Of the 2,000,000 illiterate voters in the United States 1,700,000 are in the Southern States. These States elect thirty-two of the seventy-four Senators and one hundred and nine of the two hundred and ninety-two Representatives in Congress.

In Alabama 53 per cent. of the voters are illiterate. Ignorance controls the election of the Legislature, members of Congress, the executive, the judiciary, and composes more than half of every jury; but who controls ignorance? The old slave caste of the South. The same is true in Mississippi, Georgia, and Florida. In Kentucky 28 per cent. is illiterate; in Maryland 22; in Delaware 24, or one-fourth of all power is in these ignorant masses, and they are in the hands of the political Jesuits of the South.

It is a deadly fact that the ignorance of the southern masses wielded by an educated caste, if they once get possession of the Government, can govern and enslave the whole country.

Commenting upon these startling revelations, the able and indefatigable Commissioner of Education says in his annual report for the year 1871:

> But these tremendous figures do not show the extent of this threatening evil, for the measure of future adult illiteracy is found in the present record of the number of children growing up without a knowledge of the rudiments of learning.
> Were an invading hostile army to threaten our frontiers the whole people would rise in arms to repel them; but these tables show the mustering of the hosts of a deadlier foe, a more relentless enemy, already within our own borders and by our very fire-sides; a great army of ignorance growing ever stronger, denser, and more invincible.
> Ten years without schools for children will insure an adult generation of ignorant citizens, who in losing the knowledge of will have lost the desire for letters. Athens sank rapidly till its transcendent fame became only a tradition. Hostile barbarians plunged Rome into a long night of ignorance.

Here I would gladly stop; but it is better to know the worst and to provide for it. The index-finger of reason points to the rising generation for the fate of the Republic. A people once degenerating from a condition of refined civilization may be destroyed, but will never reform. Duty, then, compels us to study the following statistics, because they involve the problem of national life. They are the cold mathematical statement of the future which we transmit to those who will kiss our lips when cold in death and decorate our graves. The children of the Republic have a right to receive from us the elements and possibilities of a happy existence, since we have compelled them to live. Examine these figures, and tell me if in one-half century of time, unless new agencies are created and old ones quickened for the education of this people, existence in America is likely to be a blessing or a curse?

Latest returns for year 1875 are as follows, from a personal examination of the records of the Bureau of Education:

This table includes all between the age of five and twenty-one years, while those of 1870 include those between five and eighteen years. It is difficult to see, considering this circumstance and the quite considerable increase of population in some of the States since 1870, (being in Texas from 818,599 to more than 1,200,000, or 50 per cent. increase,) whether the schools have lost or gained during the last six years; but local legislation has recently become very hostile to them. It is a pertinent question how long they could live with the southern democracy dominant in all departments of the National Government.

Having shown the alarming condition of education, or rather of compulsory ignorance, in the country generally, and especially in the Southern States, I invite the attention of the House to evidence tending to prove that the governing white class at the South—who were the slaveholders and rebels, and since then have been and now are the real leaders of the democratic party of the country, dictating its policy in peace and in war, both foreign and domestic, for sixty years, until to-day, and sure so to do for years to come, if that party should unfortunately continue to live—have always been hostile to popular education, as the one deadly enemy to the institution of slavery while it lasted, and as the great and, in fact, only real obstacle to the restoration of their old supremacy over labor, black and white, at home, and their political ascendency in the nation at large; and that the triumph of the democratic party will endanger, if not destroy, the free schools at the South, restore the domination of the privileged land-owning class or caste, and reduce all labor of whatever race to a practical servitude more advantageous to the old masters than slavery itself, restore the policy which produced the rebellion, and which must, if pursued, ultimately divide and destroy the country.

I assume, because no one is ignorant of the fact, that previous to the war there was no common public-school system in the Southern States. There was some legislation upon the subject, but no adequate provision was made for the children of the whites, and it was a crime even secretly to teach a black child to read. The northern soldiers were the first common-school teachers who could claim that they were doing a legitimate business in the Southern States. Multitudes of the freedmen learn to read in their contact with the Army; and wherever the Army held quiet occupation for any considerable time the spelling-book was as common as the book of tactics. Schools sprang up spontaneously. Benevolence sent teachers from the North in large numbers. The Freedmen's Bureau, the discontinuance of which by the Government, in consequence of her own clamor and that of her northern allies will, in history, appear to have been a direct blow at the salvation of the South, met, so far as possible, the pressing wants of eager youth and age for knowledge, which to the poor untutored minds of the liberated freedmen was the badge of liberty. General Banks established the first colored school at New Orleans; although previously General Butler had enabled Mrs. Brice to re-open her lone private school, which in obedience to direct intimation from Heaven, as it seemed to her mind, she had opened, at the risk of her life, in September, 1860, but almost immediately closed in obedience to the outcry of the mob. And so it was everywhere all over the South that the Union forces got permanent foot-hold. There is nothing like it in the history of war. It abolished the proverb that the pen is mightier than the sword, for every true northern sword was a pen and every bayonet a blackboard pointer. The religious and other benevolent associations, also concentrated their influence chiefly upon the establishment of schools. The military State governments, the early abolition of which was such a disaster to the South, fostered and encouraged the schools, which had become numerous and well systematized.

When the military governments were discontinued and the southern people were left to themselves, with full power to build for themselves, with the ballot in their own hands, and not in the hands of the colored men at all, then the fruits of the simple-hearted northern trust in the good faith and good sense of the defeated slave power of the South appeared at once, and the real calamities of this country began. Until then the war had been a bloody blessing. The foolish over-confidence of the North, ignoring all the lessons of history and the principles of human nature, pressed, too, by the clamor of the northern democracy against interference with the sovereign rights of States, led the republican party to commit a clemency which was a crime. Such a mistake will never be repeated in the history of this country. From that day the war upon the common school, as the very citadel of free institutions, has been violently waged. Still the institution has lived, and will live, unless the people of the whole country abandon the South to her fate by restoring the democratic party to power in the General Government.

With this preliminary general outline I ask attention to the following extracts, which I have selected wholly, as I believe, from the most reliable authorities, mostly official, purposely excluding details of violence and crime, because I do not wish to excite the feelings, but appealing only to facts, figures, and results, which are the cold steel of argument, to attract attention to the course and tendency of events in the mass, and exhibit, not the animus of individuals, but the settled policy of southern democratic thought. If one-half the colored population had been murdered by the Ku-Klux, stimulated by aimless violence, or if the slaughter at Hamburgh was the ebullition of sporadic crime, and not of the madness which has method, and is based upon the cool calculation of a vast and profound political policy, no patriotic American need despair of the Republic. The common school would cure it all, and the next generation would be a prosperous, peaceful, and happy people. But the case is otherwise.

Senator Pease, of Mississippi, delivered a speech in the United States Senate, January 26, 1875, from which I make the following extract. Senator Pease was also State superintendent of public instruction for Mississippi:

> I desire to refer the Senate to the condition of education in the Southern States, and I take this occasion to say that in almost every instance (and I know whereof I affirm, because I have had the honor to be connected with the educational interests of the South) when those States were reconstructed there was no such thing as an efficient school system in the South, and in many Southern States there was no such thing known. These States had, with scarcely an exception, no school laws, and when they had they were practically inoperative, but immediately after reconstruction, in those States which were under republican administration, schoolhouses were built, educational facilities were provided for the blacks and whites alike.
> When the State of Mississippi was reconstructed there was not a single free school in the State. Under republican administration, in three years over two thousand school-houses were built and over three thousand schools were organized. Nearly one hundred thousand children were receiving tuition in the schools under the patronage of a republican administration. The same was true of Tennessee in 1868; but when the power passed from the republican party into the hands of the democracy one of their first acts was to close the schools. The schools were broken up, and not until quite recently have the people of Tennessee paid any attention to the revival of their school system. This was true also of Georgia. Under republican rule schools were established. As soon as the State passed into the hands of the democrats the schools were practically abolished; and they have to-day a merely nominal school system. I undertake to say that the different benevolent and educational associations in the North have contributed more money to support the education of the colored children and the white children in the State of Georgia than the democratic party has ever contributed during the whole history of that State. The same is true of Texas. The amount of the Peabody fund distributed in the South since the war is $3,500,000. The contributions for educational purposes at the South by the American Missionary Association of the North since the war have amounted to $1,663,000. The General Government expended through the Freedmen's Bureau nearly $6,000,000 for educational purposes in the South. During the last ten years the same benevolence has contributed, aside from the Peabody gift, over $8,000,000 for southern education; and nearly all these contributions have come from republican sources. In the State of Mississippi, when the democratic party began to feel that they were coming again into power and the Ku-Klux organizations were being formed, instead as the honorable Senator would have us believe that the southern people were anxious to educate the negro and the masses of the people, the Ku-Klux democracy burned our school-houses. Over fifty school-houses, including church buildings used for schools by the negroes, were burned in Mississippi by these lawless bands; and it is the same class of men who are foremost in the white-league movement to-day.

I would add to the above that from the best data which I have been able to get the aggregate sum expended by the General Government and by northern benevolence to support free white and colored schools at the South since the war is not less than $15,000,000. The record of the Methodist, Baptist, Congregational, and other religious denominations in the great effort to save southern society exhibits all the zeal of the early marytrs, combined with the largest wisdom which patriotism, piety, and statesmanship could devise. The report of the Committee upon Affairs in the late Insurrectionary States, which is a document of the highest historic value, on page 279 states that on the 31st day of October, 1865, in the various Southern States five hundred and sixty schools had been already established among the freedmen, and quoting from a report of General Alvord, gives his conclusion as follows: "That the experiment of educating the freedmen proves to be successful and the ignorant whites may be greatly benefited." The committee then proposes the following question:

> Were the old leaders who were forming State constitutions ignorant of this great movement?

Which they answer thus:

> No; but they feared its effects. Having prevented the slave and the free negroes from coming to the light of knowledge by penal statutes, and having seen many learning to read and write in spite of their prohibitions, sometimes at the risk of life and limb, for in some States persistence in learning to read and write has cost the slave his thumb, while in others he has pursued knowledge even unto death; and seeing this great movement of thousands of freedmen, women, and children alarmed them and shocked their prejudices, they found it would destroy the value of negro labor. From Georgia it was reported in 1865 that most of the white residents of this section took ground against schools for the education of the freed people, not only as labor lost, but some held that it was injurious to all working classes to be taught from books. In many places the education of the freedmen was forcibly resisted even to burning school-houses and killing teachers.

On page 83 the committee says:

> The adoption of the fifteenth amendment, having made the ballot secure against the spirit which opposed the thirteenth and rejected as far as it could the fourteenth amendment, presented the colored man clothed with freedom, citizenship, and the ballot. The organization of 1866, animated by the spirit and composed of the material already mentioned, had developed in the opposite direction; and in 1870 and 1871 it rode into Eutaw, Alabama, and murdered Boyd for seeking to punish by law the crime of colored men. It pursued the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church in that State because of their loyalty. In North Carolina it hung Wyatt Outlow for no other offense than opposition to the Ku-Klux and barbarously whipped Mr. Justice for exercising his political rights. In South Carolina it tortured Elias Hill for preaching the Gospel to his race, for educating their children, for leading them in their political interests and business. It assembled in force, armed and disguised, to prevent the execution of a writ of habeas corpus in Union County issued to secure ten negroes charged with murder for lawful trial, and hanged them without trial. In Mississippi it destroyed school-houses and drove away school-teachers. In Georgia, and indeed in all the States examined into, it committed murders, whippings, and outrages so numerous and so horrible, that one of the retained defenders of the perpetrators (Hon. Reverdy Johnson) has honored his own nature and denounced the existence of these enormities by declaring that in South Carolina "they are shocking to humanity; they admit neither of justification nor excuse; they violate every obligation which law and nature impose upon men."

And the policy thus portrayed has continued actively in force ever since, and has within a few days been most bloodily illustrated, reenforced, and clinched by the dastardly and wholesale murder on the unholy soil of Hamburgh, of regular soldiers of the State of South Carolina, by the assignees of the Ku-Klux, because they paraded to celebrate our centennial Fourth of July.

I now ask attention to the condition of several of the States, from which the general condition of education at the South may be inferred.

GEORGIA.

The following extract from the correspondence of the New York Times is the result of the observation of a gentleman of very high character. He writes from Savannah, Georgia, under date of October 26, 1873:

Instead of extending assistance to the weak and lowly, a system of rigorous repression in all forms and everywhere is operated and more or less rigidly enforced by the lovers of the "lost cause." They cut off the poor white and black alike from the benefit of schools, yet were their professions of appreciation of the necessity of education listened to one would suppose that no expense would be spared to educate all classes, for they base all their violent opposition to negro suffrage upon the grounds of negro ignorance. But they have not shown themselves content to withhold assistance and encouragement to the needy. In case of the negroes they caused their school-houses to be burned and their teachers to be driven off until Congress made that too dangerous a business. In this State the laws imposing poll-taxes, sacredly set apart by our constitution for school purposes, are executed with harshness against the negroes, but it is done simply because the payment of that tax is a prerequisite for voting; for the enforcement is only attempted at elections in the infliction of the penalty of disfranchisement upon colored voters, while non-tax-paying whites vote unquestioned. Often with all this fierce zeal to collect the school-tax no public schools exist, and the poor of all classes are left to grow up in ignorance, notwithstanding the price paid to defray the expense of their education is made instrumental in disfranchising their fathers.

A word might not be amiss as to the extent of this enforced ignorance. Statistics cannot tell the whole truth, but they disclose enough to alarm philanthropists and patriots. They inform us that during the year 1870, in Georgia, only 67,000 white and 10,000 colored children—77,000 of both races—between the ages of five and eighteen years, saw the inside of school-houses out of the whole number of 407,000 children in the State. During the next year, 1871, the whole number of children reported is 425,000; only 53,551 of all sorts pretended to go to school, and these averaged only two and a half months for each child during the entire year. This ignorance is not only winked at by leading southerners, it is enforced by them and their followers.

Outside a few cities no pretense of schooling children is made at all.

It may be asked what advantage do the dominant race expect to derive from the ignorance thus supplied? It may as well be asked how could ignorance on the part of the slaves be beneficial to the masters in the days of slavery? It enables the old master class to secure to themselves the benefit of the proceeds of the negro's labor with almost as little compensation as in ante bellum times; to bind them hand and foot under the appearance of law, and still to exclude the negroes from the privilege, to any beneficial extent, of the elective franchise, while admitting them to that privilege to a degree, as the leaders fondly suppose, sufficient to quiet the apprehension of the nation on this all-important subject, and finally to control at once the labor and political power of the South.

That the old leaders of the South have a deep-seated purpose to control labor by a system of laws no one who has pretended to watch their conduct can for a moment doubt. They talk it everywhere and write it in all their papers.

* * * * * * *

The governor of the State declared a short time ago in a public address that "labor must be controlled by law. We may hold inviolate every law of the United States and still so legislate upon our labor system as to retain our old plantation system or in lieu of that establish a baronial one."

[Extract from the letter of a prominent educator living in Georgia.]

——, April 10, 1876.

DEAR SIR: * * * I have had charge of the principal male school in this place since 1855, but am not now teaching on account of the failure of my sight. * * * From a familiarity with the standard and progress of education in Middle Georgia for thirty years, twenty-five of which I have spent in laborious teaching, I ought to have a correct opinion of the present status as compared with the past. *I regret the necessity of reporting to you, after a life nearly spent in earnest labor opening views to the young on the fields of science, that the standard of education in all our common schools is lowering. * * * The next census will show more white adults in Georgia unable to read and write than did that of the last decade.* * * * The colored people as a whole are more ignorant and superstitious than they were the day of their emancipation, because less in contact with the educated whites, and though a few of them have surprisingly improved their opportunities, the mass of them must of necessity ever be the wards of the nation.

ARKANSAS.

Hon. Thomas Smith, superintendent of public instruction, in his report for 1871 and 1872 to the governor and General Assembly of Arkansas, says:

At the last session of the General Assembly I submitted a report covering the time from the inauguration of the present free-school system up to the 30th September, 1870, embracing a period of something over two years. During that time the system had been put in successul operation; many difficulties had been surmounted * * * and schools had been established in nearly every county in the State. The work of organizing school districts had progressed until most of the townships contained one or more, and many rude but comfortable school-houses had already been built for the accommodation of the several neighborhoods, * * * and many teachers had been attracted hither from the older States by the new and interesting field opened up to educational effort by the inauguration of the free-school system in our State.

He then explains a recent law of the General Assembly, the passage of which was procured by the "enemies of free schools," which reduced taxation for the support of schools and authorized its payment in a depreciated interest-bearing scrip, and adds:

The consequence was the school fund, both State and district, was paid into the State and county treasury, mostly in this kind of depreciated paper, worth but little more during the year past than half its par value. This, of course, reduced the school fund to about half what it would have been in currency * * * which so crippled a large portion of the districts that it was impossible to support even a three months' school. Teachers * * * became disheartened and disgusted and have left the State, and our schools have been deprived of many of our most valuable teachers. The object in thus dwelling upon the mistaken policy of the Legislature is to show how the course pursued has served to embarrass and well-nigh destroy our free-school system of education, which had been so auspiciously inaugurated and so successfully carried forward during the first two years of its history.

LOUISIANA.

Referring to the democratic party, Hon. T. W. Conway, State superintendent of education of Louisiana, says in his report of 1871, page 45:

The antagonism of a portion of the press and of a powerful class of the people to the constitutional provisions which control this work (that of education) is too well known to require more than a passing allusion. The opposition thus inspired has come from a class of men who prefer that the blight of ignorance should wither the strength of the State rather than the benefits of education should be extended under the law and constitution as they now exist. Unable to emancipate themselves from irrational prejudice, by which both intellect and conscience have been mastered, and haunted by the phantoms of a régime which has forever passed away, they have maintained an opposition, active or passive, as circumstances would allow, to every advancing step which has been taken.

His own italics.

In his report for 1873, page 50, Hon. William G. Brown, State superintendent, in the spirit of the martyr who dies triumphant in the flames, after enumerating the obstacles to be surmounted, breaks forth in the following eloquent strain:

The crusade against ignorance, bigotry, superstition, and caste inaugurated in the South must be carried forward. No one that reads the signs of the times or that surveys the work of the forces of education and estimates the value of the citadels taken and territory occupied can doubt for one moment the result. It were better for the enemies of education in the South that millstones were hanged about their necks and they cast into the depths of the sea, because the awakening from the delusion which prompts their opposition will be almost as fearful as that which tormented Dives.

In August, 1875, the honorable superintendent, the same Professor W. G. Brown, in a public lecture upon education in the South in general, and especially in Louisiana, remarked that—

Previous to the war there was no established system of instruction in nine or ten of the Southern States. What schools there were were conducted exclusively for white children. It was only after reconstruction, when the republican party had assumed control, that there was such a thing as general schools. This consummation was the effect of republican rule. The democratic party, there as elsewhere, were against the spread of intelligence through the colored race. The schools of the South had been opened with but scanty means for their support, and under the most tremendous opposition. A large portion of the tax-payers would have nothing to do with mixed schools. The native whites in many sections were bitterly opposed to them. In several of the Southern States the constitutions prohibited the establishment of separate schools. In Texas the public-school system was abolished immediately upon the accession of the democratic party to power. In Alabama and Arkansas we find substantially the same thing. In Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, and South Carolina, where educational interests were under the control of the republican party, progress was being made notwithstanding all discouragements. In North Carolina, Virginia, and Kentucky, on the other hand, where the schools were made separate by the law and constitution, there was but little progress made.

And again Mr. Conway states, in report of 1871, page 123:

In my last inspection tour to which I have referred I visited a community of over twelve hundred inhabitants where I was informed a Christain minister had never been except a Catholic priest, and he had been there but once for over a year. I further assert that I do not believe six persons could be found there, excepting three teachers who had been sent there in charge of schools, who could read and write in any language, or that a particle of printed matter, not even the Bible, could be found in one of their houses, except the school-books that had been recently sent there for the use of pupils.

TENNESSEE.

Upon authority of Hon. John M. Fleming, State superintendent of public instruction, and Hon. J. B. Killebrew, January, 1873, report of 1873, page 371, they say:

In the public mind, respectability does not attach to public schools, and, except in those cities which have established schools of such transcendent merit as to compel the discontinuance of private schools, no correct idea of a well-founded system prevails in the State.

The report of the commissioner of education who organized the common schools of Tennessee prior to 1870 with great efficiency and success, and in the face of all obstacles which ignorance, prejudice, and caste power could present, shows that when the schools were becoming highly prosperous and 185,000 children were already receiving instruction in them, having recovered power in the State the democratic party abolished the whole system and substantially destroyed the schools. But the seed sown had taken root, and an awakened public sentiment among the people has compelled the restoration of the leading features of the system.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

In his report for the year 1873, Hon. J. K. Jillson, superintendent of public instruction, referring to the attitude of the press, observes:

In many instances the public press of this State has treated our free common school-system with contempt, injustice, ridicule, and unfairness. Every public enterprise and interest ought always to be open to the fair and just criticisms of a fearless, independent, and incorruptible public press. Abuse and misrepresentation cannot, however, be palmed off as criticism upon an intelligent community. There are within our borders a few bright and shining examples of a hireling and partisan press which in the good times to come * * * will only be remembered and regarded as relics of a past era of journalistic barbarism.

In passing, I propose to the House and to the American people this question: Who ever heard of a republican newspaper or of a republican citizen North or South that was opposed to the cause of popular education?

MISSISSIPPI.

Hon. H. R. Pease, superintendent of public instruction, in his report of 1873, and page 214 of report of Commissioner of Education, says:

Alluding to the mismanagement for forty years of the school lands bequeathed to the State for educational purposes by the General Government, to the unlawful diversion of the school funds to other than school purposes, and the irretrievable loss of millions of this sacred endowment to the people's schools on account of improper legislation and supervision, I wish to say that had a proper financial policy been pursued the school-land fund alone would now afford revenue sufficient to support a system of free schools with ample facilities for the instruction of all the youth of the State.

In his report for 1874 Hon. T. W. Cardozo remarks:

Considering the great opposition which the system has had to encounter from a vast majority of the intelligent portion of our inhabitants and the great breadth of its operations, we have every reason to congratulate ourselves that the public schools of Mississippi are now rapidly growing into popular favor and are among the established branches of our government.

It seems that they were growing too rapidly to suit the "intelligent portion" of the community, and since the white-line democracy reconquered the State there is a different report from the free schools of Mississippi.

The following letter is from the pen of a gentleman of high character who has been closely allied with the government and educational interests of Mississippi since 1865. He was chairman of the house committee on education in that State for several years:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 29, 1876.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiries about the public schools of Mississippi under the present democratic government, I answer as follows: The republicans organized the first general free-school system in 1870. The law was amended and improved in 1873. The average amount expended annually was about $600,000, or in 1872, $683,784, and in 1874, $602,481. This sum furnished schools only about five months in the year to not exceeding three-fourths of the children of school age, and was obtained by a general tax levied for that purpose on the taxable property of the State, including the poll-tax. The system was made efficient by thorough supervision, and probably no State in the Union ever witnessed better results from the expenditure of the same amount of money.

By an amendment to the Constitution adopted by the republicans, the proceeds of liquor licenses, fines, &c., amounting to about $150,000 annually, becomes available this year for immediate use, instead of going into a permanent fund as heretofore, allowing only the interest thereon to be expended. The democratic Legislature has abolished the general tax of two mills, and has provided for no certain fund but the amount last stated. The law, however, provides that the counties may levy a tax to make up the deficit in the teachers' fund, but as the law also limits the aggregate State and county taxes to $16.50 in the thousand dollars in valuation, the taxes for State and county general purposes will, in most instances, come up to this figure, which will leave the schools without money. The fund provided by the Legislature will not maintain schools exceeding a month and a half during the year. The law also says that "if the proceeds of fines, licenses, &c., do not equal the two-mill tax formerly levied, the deficit shall be supplied by transferring a sufficient amount from the general fund to the school fund," but this is only a blind, inasmuch as the "general fund" is scarcely adequate to meet the running expenses of the government, and it must have been known when the law was enacted that there would be no surplus. The next damaging blow to the system is the virtual abolishment of the office of county superintendent. The republicans regarded efficient supervision of the schools as of the first importance, and exacted much patient service of their superintendents. They were paid an average salary of $800 per annum. The late (democratic) act cuts down the salaries to just one-fifth of what was formerly paid, fixing the maximum at $270 per annum and the minimum at $60 per annum. When it is remembered that some counties are thirty by forty miles square and have as many as one hundred and twenty-five schools, it will be seen that the pay proposed amounts to nothing. No capable man can afford to accept the office and take its responsibilities. The provision to pay teachers is as follows:

"The county superintendent and board of supervisors shall, at the beginning of each school year, fix a maximum salary for teachers which shall not be more than $40 for each school with an average daily attendance of twenty-five or more pupils, and in schools where the average daily attendance is less that twenty-five the amount paid shall not exceed eight cents per day for the actual attendance of each pupil."

This paltry compensation, with the almost absolute certainty that the pay warrant, when drawn, will be against an empty treasury, and the consequent sacrifice of the protested paper at some broker's office at 25 per cent. discount, will drive all the really competent teachers back into private schools, and the public-school system will come generally into disrepute and worthlessness.

In conclusion, the democrats have committed the fraud of preserving the appearance of a free-school system on paper, while practically it is lifeless, and will about as completely leave the people without schools as if they had repealed and abolished all laws on the subject.

Truly yours,

H. T. FISHER.

Hon. H. W. BLAIR,
House of Representatives.

The following letter is from Ex-Governor Powers, of Mississippi:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 29, 1876.

SIR: In reply to your note received to-day, I have to say that I was the presiding officer of the senate during the first and second sessions of the Legislature of Mississippi held after reconstruction in 1870, 1871, and 1872. In carrying into effect the provisions of our State constitution, which required the establishing of a system of free public schools, a just and fair bill was, after much deliberation and care, matured, the democrats participating, and the bill was in many instances amended to suit their views; but when it came to final passage every member of that party in both branches of the Legislature voted against it. At that time the entire democratic press of the State, with perhaps one or two exceptions, bitterly opposed the establishment of the common-school system, and declared it wrong in principle to tax the property of the white man to educate the children of the colored man. Subsequent to this, during the summer of 1871, democratic conventions in several counties of the State, namely, Newton, Choctaw, Winston, and others, passed resolutions denouncing free schools. In those counties where the opposition to the system was the bitterest, school-houses, constructed in accordance with law, were burned. In Winston, not only were school-houses burned, but churches also, for the avowed reason that they were used for the purposes of free schools. This opposition on the part of the democracy of Mississippi to the free-school system, while it has in some measure modified, has not ceased, as is proven by the fact that the present Legislature, at its last session, failed to levy a direct tax, as had been previously done by republican Legislatures, for the support and maintenance of common schools, leaving therefor only such sums as accrue from sale of lands, liquor licenses, and fines; an amount in the aggregate totally inadequate to the purpose. There was also left on hand by the republicans about $66,000 in the treasury.

The law was in other respects materially changed, the result of which, if persisted in, must be to destroy the entire free-school system of the State.

I am, sir, yours respectfully,

R. C. POWERS,
Ex-Governor of Mississippi.

Hon. H. W. BLAIR,
New Hampshire.

TEXAS.

Hon. J. C. De Gress, State superintendent of public instruction, in his report to the Commissioner of Education, says:

In May, 1873, the State Legislature abolished the school law which had been in operation since 1871, and passed another of which the governor of the State says in declining to approve the act, page 383:

"The constitution (article 9, section 4) directs the Legislature to establish a uniform system of free schools throughout the State; but this act, though in its title it proposes to establish such a system, in reality does away with all systems."

It, however, became a law notwithstanding the opposition of the governor. And William Alexander, attorney-general of the State, says, page 384:

After careful study of the school law of May 22, 1873, I am forced to conclude that so many of its provisions are unconstitutional, while others are impracticable, that it cannot be put into operation.

And of its practical effect the State superintendent says:

The last Legislature enacted a new school law, repealing the old one, and in effect abolishing our rapidly growing system of common schools. Under this law no uniform system of public free schools as required by the State constitution can be established; in fact the poor, to whom alone the free-schools are to be opened, can never under it be educated. * * * In short, the old pauper law of the State is being substantially re-enacted. The school fund is hence likely to be given away to private institutions of learning, while those who are unable to pay for the tuition of their children and who are too proud to acknowledge themselves paupers will be deprived of an education solemnly guaranteed to them by the constitution of the State and indorsed by the Congress of the United States.

The public domain (of the State) on the 31st day of August, 1872, consisted of 88,842,704½ acres of land, the proceeds of which were, by section 6, article 9, of the State constitution, to become a part of the common-school fund, but the last Legislature gave away one-half of such lands to corporations.

And the Attorney-General further says in his official opinion:

Besides, the constitution enacts that no law shall ever be made appropriating such (school) fund for any other use or purpose whatever, and the Congress of the United States guaranteed this enactment by providing that the constitution of Texas shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the school rights and privileges secured by the constitution of said State.

This was a fundamental condition upon which the State was restored "to its practical relations" with the Union. I also quote the following from the Waco Register, showing how the Texas democracy has destroyed the public schools by attempted constitutional enactment in violation of the fundamental conditions of her restoration to the Union:

Our Texas democratic governor, Coke, who has been elected by the Legislature to the United States Senate, may not be able to get into that body. He has been elected under a constitution in violation of the act of Congress admitting the State to representation in Congress. The act of Congress of which we speak (act of 30th of March, 1870, United States Statutes, volume 16, page 80) says, "The performance of these several acts in good faith is a condition-precedent to the representation of the State (of Texas) in Congress." It also says, "That the State of Texas is admitted to representation in Congress as one of the States of the Union upon the following fundamental conditions," namely, * * * "Third, that the constitution of Texas shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the school rights and privileges secured by the constitution of said State." Now the constitution has been so changed as to deprive citizens of the school rights enumerated.

The late constitution provided for public schools for at least four months in the year, and also that "one-fourth of the annual revenue derivable from taxation shall be levied and collected for the benefit of public schools."

The new constitution (under which Coke has been elected to the Senate) does not make it obligatory upon the State government to levy, collect, or set apart one cent of the revenue derivable from taxation to schools.

The constitution under which Coke has been elected is right in the face of the act of Congress under which all our Texas Senators and Representatives have been admitted up to this time since the war, including Senators HAMILTON, Flanagan, MAXEY, and all the Representatives.

The following is taken from the leading republican paper in Texas. Mr. Chase, the editor, is a native of New Hampshire, and a gentleman of high character and thoroughly acquainted with that of which he affirms:

ANSWER TO INQUIRIES.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 10, 1876.

DEAR SIR: Will you please inform me what the exact status is of your free-school system under democratic management? What does the present law provide for? What amount of money or taxes, and what is the educational condition under the democratic administration? I see you have or are to have a new law on this subject. Did not the democrats abolish free schools when they came into power? What is the character of the school trust fund? What have they done with it? I should also like to know what your rate of taxation is and the condition of your State finances.

W. R. CHASE,
Waco, Texas.

We have concluded to publish our reply to the above:

1. There are no free schools in the State; at least, we are aware of none either in this section or elsewhere in this State.

2. "The present law" provides for nothing which supports schools. The present law sets apart alternate sections of State public lands to schools, but money is not realized from these nor expected to be realized sufficient to support a system of public schools.

3. No money derived from taxation is set apart for schools under the democratic administration.

4. Yes, the democrats abolished free schools when they came into power. We had a good free-school system and in excellent operation under our republican administration, and under which the children of the State were being educated. Under our constitution (republican) all the public lands and one-fourth of the revenue of the State derived from taxation were set apart to schools, and the constitution made it obligatory upon the Legislature to provide free schools for not less than four months in the year. When the democrats came in they abolished this constitution and have put one in its place which sets apart only one-half the public lands to schools and does not make it obligatory upon the State government to set apart a cent of the money derived from taxes to schools. Under this (democratic) constitution the schools have gone down.

5. The school trust funds were in United States bonds; but the democratic Legislature has just ordered these bonds to be sold for the money, with which they will pay themselves for their services and issue their own (State) depreciated bonds to be put in the place of the United States bonds. The transaction is simply a robbery from the school fund.

6. Taxes have been heavier every year under democratic administration than they were any year under republican administration and have increased from year to year. The rate may be no higher but more things are taxed.

7. The condition of our State finances is that the legislative finance committee has just reported a deficiency of the rise of $300,000 of taxes to meet current expenses of the State government. The comptroller asserts this deficiency to be $500,000. The State has been steadily run in debt at the rate of about a million of dollars a year since the present administration came into power.

DELAWARE AND KENTUCKY.

The animus of the original slave democracy toward free schools is clearly seen in Delaware and Kentucky, where they have constantly been in power before, during, and since the war. In neither of these States does the law permit any portion of the tax levied upon property of the whites to be appropriated to the education of colored children, and as the colored people have very little property the enforced ignorance of their children may be imagined possibly but not described.

North Carolina raises less than $1, and I am informed only fifty cents each to educate her children, while Massachusetts, not educating hers as well by any means as she ought, expends $22 annually.

It is no excuse that a State is poor. There is no industry so productive as the cultivation of the mind, and there is no way to material wealth so sure and rapid.

PROGRESS OF PAPAL INFLUENCE AT THE SOUTH.

There is still another powerful source of danger to the schools, and that is the undoubted alliance between the policy of southern politicians, and that of the Romish propagandists in this country. It will be remembered that the only foreign potentate who recognized the confederacy was the Pope. Both seek a common end, power; the one temporal, the other both temporal and spiritual. And even if there is no formal secret alliance between the caste and the hierarchy there is the same tendency to practical subordination of the people; the one leading to an ignorant subserviency and the other to an educated subserviency, if I may so express myself. The papal church is alert to the fact that nowhere else on earth is there such a field for the cultivation of power as in the Southern States. Whoever holds them in a body, by dividing the North and West, can rule the country. Whoever rules the country will control this hemisphere, and in one century hence will govern the globe. Indications are not wanting that, alarmed by the aroused indignation of the North at the effort to divide the school money there for sectarian uses, the wily Jesuits are changing the ground of their attack to the defenseless ignorance of the South, where, with no obstacles and slight competition, they may build broad and deep the foundations of spiritual and temporal power.

A recent issue of the Montgomery (Alabama) Advertiser remarks:

> The Catholic Church is making a determined effort to extend their educational work at the South. The headquarters of this work are in Baltimore, where the priests, nuns, and sisters from abroad report, and are detailed to various parts of the South. New schools for colored children are to be immediately opened, as follows: ten in Georgia, fifteen in Alabama, fifteen in Mississippi, and twenty-five in Louisiana. These schools will offer board and tuition free to colored young men and women.

While nothing is more common than hostility, and even violence, to the free Protestant or public schools and their teachers, who ever has known of any systematic or even casual violence or opposition to a Catholic school at the South? But I can only suggest this topic; and I desire most emphatically to say that if the country will not supply him with anything better, then, by all means, let the southern child seek knowledge and discipline in the schools provided for him by the Catholic church. Better anything than the savage state; and what lover of his country can neglect his duty to vote for free schools, and then condemn the magnificent charity of the Catholic Church, whether her motive be benevolence or power, or both.

I have thus, sir, at great length but without producing a tithe of the immense mass of evidence, which exists and rises from thirteen States of this Union in the face of Heaven, like the poisoned exhalations of the dismal swamp, endeavored to arrest the attention of the House, and fix it upon the danger to the Republic and to humanity, which arises from the great and growing predominance of the ignorant, and consequently weak and vicious elements, in the land. And, sir, I protest here and now, that the issue upon the schools involves their existence as a system, and that the schools are the only sure bulwarks of our liberties. I protest that neither false issues, nor secondary issues, shall be elevated into absorbing importance in this campaign. The school question in the South is comparatively the only question involved in this presidential election. It leaps over all the interests of this generation and grasps the fate of millions yet to be.

There has been no crisis like this in our political affairs since Gettysburgh. Never since then has there been a season of more doubt and danger of the loss of the control of the country, by the republican party. Not because the party is corrupt or weak, or has failed in its mission; but because the grinding burdens of the rebellion and the incessant hostility of the democratic party, both North and South, to peaceable acquiescence in the logical results of the war, and the incessant reiteration of false and defamatory charges of personal and official corruption, everywhere, and especially against upright and patriotic representative men of the republican party, which republicans have failed properly to resent, forgetting, that in defending the men who are assailed only because they represent our cause, we defend the cause itself, together with all the bickerings, jealousies, and unpatriotic rivalries, which to some extent have necessarily arisen during sixteen years of tremendous power and responsibility, with some actual malfeasance among the trusted officials of the country, although there never has been so little official corruption and dishonor, or so much of strict integrity and high purpose in the administration of any other government, nor of this Government, as since the republican party has controlled it. These, with other causes, have conspired to create among the people a feeling of unrest and disquiet, which may obscure the startling consequences involved. A pestiferous demagogery, a false pretense to personal and political virtue and capacity, and deafening shouts for "peace, peace," at the South, when there is no peace but in the grave; for Tammany and reform, for Hendricks and hard money, for Tilden, resumption, and repeal, ring throughout the country and split the ears of the people. Thus it is hoped to divert public attention from the nature of this contest and to wheedle the American people out of the only guarantee of its liberties—the common school. This is not the purpose of the mass of the democratic party either North or South; for at the South with increasing intelligence there will develop a great white republican party from that splendid yeomanry which furnished the blood, as the slave power did the policy and disciplined intellect of the war. These people, now so ignorant of their interests and of their rights, will, if once the common school breaks through the obstacles which supervene between them, become the stanchest friends of both the schools and of the great northern republican party which they now so ignorantly defame, being exceeding mad against us and verily believing that they are doing God's service; and in these men is the hope of the South. At the North a democrat has the same interest for his child as a republican, though blindly he gropes after the light which the republican has long since found. But however honest may be the masses of the democratic party everywhere—for masses of men are always honest—the policy of the party leaders will conduct both it and the country to ruin.

To be forewarned is to be forearmed. If it is true that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, there was never a time when its exercise was more important. A false step now, when there is so much to concentrate attention upon ourselves, and the distresses, partly real and partly fancied, of to-day, will be calamitous and perhaps without remedy.

The democratic party has been an agency of fraud and destruction for thirty years. Out of the national ruin and dishonor, with which it piled the land, has grown up the republican party, under the inspiration of Heaven, to recreate and restore. The one represents the affirmative of every evil, and the negative of every good proposition, in our politics: State-rights, discredit to our national promises, which its own treason compelled us to pledge by billions in the markets of the world, the insidious destruction or the emasculation of the free schools, and the restoration of the caste power of the South, to curse all sections once more, and enthrone upon the backs of freemen a landed aristocracy bloated with bonds written in their blood. The other is the party of progress, reform, freedom. It has youth, inspiration, destiny. It has already a history in whose brief record of twenty years is written the drama of ten common centuries of illustrious deeds. Hand in hand the patriarch of the Revolution and the martyr of the rebellion, shall march through the halls of the ages until time shall be no more.

The same thunderbolt of liberty which struck the earth at Marathon and Salamis, at Bannockburn and Bunker Hill, fell again at Vicksburgh and Appomattox; and the inspiration which has kindled the souls of patriots and freemen in all decisive epochs of time, and prompted great sacrifices and heroic deeds for the universal rights of man, dwells as a living fire in the hearts and the history of the republican party. To what great interest of this country, of this whole country, is it not true? What right of the weak and lowly does it not vindicate? What just privilege of the great does it not secure? When and where has the policy of the republican party swerved from the principles of universal liberty protected by law? Where are concentrated the redemptory influences of the nation? Where is the religious and reformatory press? Where is the active leadership of aggressive piety? Where is the control and the chief pecuniary support of the missionary, and higher educational institutions of the land? Let our enemies consider and let them judge how many centuries of progress would be annihilated were the men and influences which are knit together in the republican party eliminated from society and replaced with an equal mass of the democracy, which howls and hiccoughs for Tilden and reform. The two great parties are now in the ralley of decision. In three months it will all be over. The time is short and the stake is tremendous. It concerns not this nation alone. It involves vast consequences to the race. But to no part of mankind is it so imperatively necessary that republicanism should triumph as to our blind brethren of the South. They may and perhaps they must hate us. Human nature will not always budge; and how can the proud, imperious slave-power of the South whisper accents of love from the dust of defeat?

It is easy for us, who are victors, to forgive; but how if we were fallen? I for one would submit, I would be admonished by events, I would repair, I would restore, I would teach my children the new and more excellent way, I would co-operate with my conqueror in the restoration of the power and glory of my country, and would try to wear my mask in submission to the laws and in retrieving the consequences of my fault, if not my crime. I would not insult nor deny the clemency and magnanimity of the country which spared me, and which invited me to a higher and more illustrious destiny than ever before lifted itself into the possibilities of my existence; and I would do justice to my former foes. But that I would ever, in my secret heart, love them, God knows that I doubt it, neither do I expect it from the leaders of the South. But they ought to accept the inevitable. They should find vengeance and revenge in grasping every advantage which has come to them on the wings of war. Did she only know it, the South conquered at Appomattox. She conquered herself. God was on her side. He presided over both combatants, and, in the very valley of the shadow of four years of death He beat and pounded the North and South in the mortar of His Providence, until He had broken in pieces the great national crime which provoked His wrath, and gave us another fair chance in the race of national life.

Sir, it is neither possible nor desirable to forget the past, and with it the lessons which, if remembered, may save us from the return of like calamities. The rebellion was a political crime. If any considerable portion of the people of this country believe it to have been otherwise, and shall train up their children in like faith, and consequently to cherish a sentiment that the people who waged war against this Government have been wronged by their defeat, and that justice must yet be done, either by extraordinary pecuniary favors or by future political advantages, to obtain which the bonds of the Union are to be acquiesced in, and not to be loved for themselves, then the future of this nation is bloodier than the past. The talk of a restored Union is mockery. If the South again participates in the affairs of this Government, all the while cherishing a secret sense of burning wrong, and is here to clamor for justice, there is no peace. Clemency she has received. She has profited by it. But she is too proud to admit that she is forgiven. She has been saved from herself, from her own madness and fanaticism, however honestly and desperately she may have fought to ruin our common country, and herself most of all; and men who come here to swear to a modified oath of allegiance have no right to taunt those who represent the sentiment which alone has preserved to them, and to us all, a country worth living and dying for with injustice to the South. I fervently believe that the real sentiment and temper of the southern people, as a whole, does not justify the sentiment that the North has wronged the South. Peace does not lie in that direction. Neither, sir, can I entertain any respect for that other tendency which is sometimes observed, and in accordance with which northern men are encouraged to express themselves, which presents the South to us as our very desolate and sorely-stricken sister, unable to stand without support, a sickly suppliant for crumbs of comfort, without resources, without fertility, or power of recuperation.

There is no southern State to-day which is not stronger, mightier, and more blest, in her actual condition, and infinitely happier in her near future and more illustrious destiny, than before the war. Every one of them is more populous, every one of them is wealthier, more prosperous, better governed, and, in spite of terrible and disgraceful opposition, better educated to-day than before the war. She knows it all herself.

Even the distinguished orator from Georgia, who last winter said that the South, in her exit from this Hall, carried with her the Constitution of the country, and therefore by implication asserted that she left here nothing but a howling mob of fanatical revolutionists, who under the lead of Lincoln, Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, and Sumner, Wilson, Fessenden, Chase, and Stanton, and Stevens, and others, whose names are written honorably in history side by side with those of Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, Adams, and Hamilton, and the long roll of the conscript fathers of the Republic, subjugated a wronged and weaker people, and hold them to-day in their tyrannical embrace—even he does not wish to restore the States of his section with slavery in its ancient form, which was the primal cause of all our woes.

And I again say, sir, that the South is stronger and happier for the war. She has gained infinitely more by it than has the North. Considering their relative resources, she is comparatively free from debt. Taxation, compared with the burdens imposed in my own State, is almost unknown. The expenses of her war she has never paid. Thank Providence, old England who robbed us of our commerce and got clear of us for a paltry fifteen millions, lost a great portion of the confederate debt, and some of the northern democrats contributed their share. The liberation of the slaves, instead of being a loss, was a vast and immeasurable gain to her resources by so much as five millions of free, happy, thinking, active human souls are more valuable than so many dumb driven cattle.

Look, too, at the resources of the South. Behold her unlimited territory, almost one million square miles of the best soil created, nearly all of it available and most valuable for the purposes of civilized man; larger than the British Isles, France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Germany, and Austria combined, comprising all Europe to the vast Empire of the Czar; with a climate that realizes the enchanting reminiscences of the Island of the Blest, which haunts the soul in the hour of her diviner musings; with river sfor a magnificent commerce and for mechanical power beyond computation, mountains of iron and gold, valleys, plains, and savannahs waiting for the teeming millions yet to be. She is a land, sir, of marvelous prophecy. I have made some effort to know her prospects and capacities, but cannot trespass upon the House with statistical matter upon the subject to-day. But the South will support two hundred millions of people, with no more persons to the square mile than now live in Western and Central Europe. Even this is not the limit of her wonderful future; for, considering her greater natural fertility, resources, and advantages, I fully believe that our little sister which, in the language of the song of songs as sung by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and other southern bards of the cypress order, "hath no breasts," can feed from the uprising fountains of her blessed bosom three hundred millions of souls. Sir, I am ashamed to hear the whine of these gentlemen who strive to believe that they are poor. In 1860 the number of hands employed as blacksmiths, coopers, carpenters, joiners, painters, varnishers, masons, and stone-cutters, by the census, was in the Southern States 72,046. In 1870 the whole number was 83,237, an increase in these classes of mechanics of 11,466. The State returns show that the increased aggregate value of property from 1868 to 1874 in the State of Georgia was $81,857,772. In Texas, per State reports, it appears that the taxable property increased in value from $144,260,244 in 1868 to $223,410,920 in 1874, or an increase in six years of 54 per cent., which beats the interest of the bloated bondholder of the North.

As there is great complaint of oppressive taxation at the South, which is wickedly attributed to the republican party, I think the following matter deserves attention in this connection.

By virtue of the laws of Mississippi in force before the war, and in force until quite recently, which limited taxation upon land to ten cents on every hundred dollars' worth of the value of the land to be estimated by the owner or person having possession or in charge thereof, the plantations substantially escaped taxation; and the consequence was that, the inventories of property taxable being very much smaller in amount than they should have been, the rate of taxation to the valuation of property was very high; the chief burdens of taxation were thrown upon personal property, the receipts of business, and upon individuals. The valuation of land was very seldom indeed as high as $10 per acre, and so down to five cents. In thousands of instances it was $1 per acre, and in that case it would take one thousand acres of land to yield one single dollar of revenue.

The Bay Saint Louis (Mississippi) Gazette, a strong democratic paper, I think in the year 1869 stated that at that time "not one-half the taxable lands in Hancock County were assessed at all, and that the assessed portion was generally rated at five cents per acre. By act of the democratic Legislature of Mississippi in 1865 it was provided that "all blacksmiths, bakers, butchers, brickmakers, carriage-makers, carpenters, dealers in timber, lumber, or shingles, gas companies, contractors of bridges, printers, gunsmiths, saw-mills, shoemakers, tailors, tanners, whatchmakers, painters, milliners, &c., shall pay twenty-five cents on every one hundred dollars' worth of gross receipts, not of capital or profit, but of gross receipts or earnings, which is two and one-half times as much as was required of landowners upon a basis of fifty times greater hardship; and innkeepers, apothecaries, &c., besides their licenses, paid $1 on each $100 of gross receipts. The county of Warren, including the city of Vicksburgh, is the wealthiest county in the State, and the tax-rolls show the following extraordinary state of things for the year 1869—I may be incorrect as to the year:

Colonel Benson Blake and wife's total of taxes on 8,506 acres of the best cotton lands in the State, including a magnificent residence and the finest improvements in the county, all told, is only $99.78.

Colonel Joseph E. Davis, total taxes on 3,793 acres of bottom land, fronting on the Mississippi River, including the Hurricane plantation, which he recently sold for $50,000, $141.14.

Heirs of General John A. Quitman, 6,810 acres of same sort of land, handsomely improved, including a plantatinn which was rented for $30,000 per annum, the same year it was assessed paid tax, in all, $184.64, making 19,101 acres of best land in the South, worth at the very least $20 per acre, or $382,020, paying a total tax of $439.56.

Remember that this is the taxation which the democracy had imposed upon the real wealth of the South. This was the policy of the slave power before and after the war. Look now at its policy toward labor and human beings:

Mr. Charles Peine pays by the same records, on license and receipts of his livery stable, &c., $1 on $100	$671 03
George & Burchett, on receipts of apothecary shop	502 85
Herrick & Dirr, photographers	200 00
B. Stricken, the butcher	224 95
Fred. Loyd, another butcher	243 70
Kleinmann & Beck, bricklayers, on their own work, pay	87 76
Philip Gilbert, shoemaker, pays	75 28
Bodenhard, on his soda fountain, pays	115 88
W. P. Creecy, on salary of $1,200 per annum as clerk in hardware store, no property but that	33 00
Mr. Vetch, a barber, no property but his soap, shears, and razors, pays	107 63
Pompey Higgins, a colored drayman, on his dray and two mules, pays	33 82
Daily and Weekly Herald pays on receipts	185 20
Daily and Weekly Times	164 80

This glaring and systematic robbery of labor by wealth, by virtue of laws enacted by the latter, has been constantly opposed by republicans, and in their new constitution I am informed that they have endeavored to remedy it by means of some "modified" or "iron-clad" oath. I now ask attention to the following tables. What has been shown in regard to undervaluation of property will be borne in mind in connection with the rate of taxation per thousand. That taxation must be very slight in such States as Mississippi if the property was properly assessed instead of being exempted in favor of the landed caste is apparent:

States.	Ratio of taxation per $1,000.	Per head.
Nevada	$26 34	$19 30

Sir, the South is not poor, unless it is in the disposition to work and in the blind folly of her leaders. They fight destiny, and beg to be destroyed. No people ever had such an opportunity, but they will not see.

There is no country like this under the sun. Upon their billion square miles of the garden of God they have 15,000,000 of their own people. They have the active, anxious, persistent, cherishing policy of the General Government which they spleenfully and stupidly and wickedly defame, deride, oppose, and endeavor to destroy. They have a love for destruction, because the gods have made them mad. They persist in a course which, if they could pursue it, would renew the war. Sometimes I think they really desire it as soon as rest, growth, and recuperation can fill their fields with armed men under the stars and bars. If such a conflict must come, may God bring it soon or avert it till I am no more.

Nothing but the defeat of the democratic party in the nation can save the South. If Tilden is elected, her supposed victory will prove her destruction. For a time she will exult. Free from restraint to the exercise of her will within her own limits, and largely so in shaping national policy, the strong reactionary tendencies, which may yield to some extent and coalesce with the prevailing forces of northern and western sentiment should the republicans retain the national administration, will in case of democratic success re-assert themselves, and southern statesmen, a few of whom now appear to have a vision of the promised land, will die, and their people will die, without the sight. A few years will consolidate the sections in hostile array of sentiment, for the North will never surrender the fruits of the struggle, and then, when the country is wealthier, more populous, mightier, there must come another war, to which the last would bear the relation of a skirmish to Waterloo.

The North may possibly endure the calamity of a democratic victory, but it will be certain ruin for this generation to the South. During the last ten years the South has really fought by all the agencies she could employ for the maintenance of her class-power. Her more advanced statesmen are beginning to see their mistake, but not fully; and still she hopes for a success, which if achieved will be destruction. Should she now fail, her leaders will fully realize that in the vain struggle to restore her former supremacy through the democratic party she is losing all the magnificent prospects which spread out before her, if she will only yield to the irresistible current of events, accept heartily the new order of things, and, by elevating her labor, rise with it to the development of a destiny, which in its grand possibilities surpasses all that poets have dreamed. But "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera," and he fell at last by a woman's hand; and why should the South any longer oppose her happier fortune and ruin everything in the vain attempt to roll the universe against the brakes of the Almighty?

I live in a smiling valley among my hardy constituents—God bless them—where the barren rocks of New England rise high into the free air of heaven, and the dews are kissed from her highest summits by the earliest light which breaks on America from the morning sun. Here generation after generation our people have fought the climate for seven months and a despotic sterility of soil during the remainder of the year. Here, too, they have grown vigorous, intelligent, virtuous, and free. New Hampshire is, by the census, the best-educated State in this Union, and I have the honor, though most unworthily, to represent the most intelligent constituency, as a whole, on the face of the globe. She sent two-thirds of the troops into action who fought and won the battle of Bunker Hill. With the co-operation of the brave Green mountaineers her Stark gave to the country the victory of Bennington. She gave you the greatest orator of time, and a monument to Washington eternal as the universe or his illustrious fame. She buried her scanty resources and her dearest sons in the golgothas of the late war as no other northern State has done. She will not see the last of her debt incurred in its prosecution paid until our grandchildren sleep the sleep that knows no waking. Her rural population is disappearing. The harvest of the war and constant drain of her hardiest sons to the illimitable West has left the summer rose to bloom in beauty and desolation by thousands of forsaken mountain homes where once clustered the tenderest affections of earth. And tears will sometimes come in the eyes of the Granite State as she looks forth from her sterility and desolation upon the vast plains and valleys of fertility and of boundless resource which lie stretched from ocean to ocean, and from the snows of Canada almost to the tropic regions of the globe, and reflects upon the blood she has shed and the treasure she has poured out and the pledge of her industry for a century, that she has signed, sealed, and delivered, and will pay to the last dollar, and yet beholds the blindness that would render the last state of the Union worse than the first.

It will never be. The country will not lose the fruits of the war. This election, which involves them all, can never be the means of restoring obsolete ideas and the enslaving policies of the past.

But I feel no hope until the South learns that she must ally herself with the strength and not with the weakness of the North.

Some time we shall understand each other, but not yet. The republican party must again rescue the country by main strength against the combined South, yoked with the corrupt and subservient democracy of the North. If we fail, God help America!

The Tariff in its Relation to Agriculture.

SPEECH OF HON. J. M. RUSK,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 11, 1876,

On the tariff in its relation to agriculture.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. Speaker, the agricultural interests of a nation exceed in importance those of every other industry. Commerce, manufactures, mining, and fisheries are relatively invaluable; but it is upon the products of its soil that a nation depends for the basis of its prosperity. Every aid extended by legislation to this department affords indirect assistance to all the other industries. This fact has ever been kept prominently in view by republican statesmen. The journals of Congress during the period the republican party has been in power bear testimony to the fact that encouragement to agriculture has been one of the fundamental principles of the party. This is seen in the passage of the homestead laws, the encouragement given to the construction of railroads through distant districts to enable agricultural products to reach paying markets, the development of the Agricultural Department of the Government, and the protection afforded to agriculture by the tariff. Under these favoring encouragements the number of acres in furrows has increased from 407,212,538 in 1860 to 407,735,041 in 1870, and this, too, against the check occasioned by the democratic rebellion and exhaustive war. The total agricultural product for 1870 as shown by the census amounted to the enormous value of $2,447,538,658. These figures tell the importance of our agricultural industries and demonstrate the wisdom of the republican policy in fostering that important interest. The customs tariff, against which the advocates of free trade have directed the most persistent opposition, has no interest more directly in view than that of agriculture. The products of the soil are as zealously protected against undue foreign importations as those of the factory. The following is the present scale of duties imposed on imported agricultural products:

Animals	20 per cent.
Bacon	2 cents per pound.
Barley	15 cents per bushel.
Beans	10 per cent.
Beef	1 cent per pound.
Butter	4 cents per pound.
Cheese	4 cents per pound.
Corn	10 cents per bushel.
Corn-meal	10 per cent.
Fruit, green	10 per cent.
Hops	5 cents per pound.
Lard	2 cents per pound.
Linseed	20 cents per bushel.
Mutton	20 per cent.
Milk	10 per cent.
Oatmeal	½ cent per pound.
Oats	20 per cent.
Pease	10 cents per bushel.
Pease, for seed	20 per cent.
Pork	1 cent per pound.
Potatoes	15 cents per bushel.
Poultry	10 per cent.
Rice, cleaned	2½ cents per pound.
uncleaned	2 cents per pound.
Rye	15 cents per bushel.
flour	10 per cent.
Sausages	35 per cent.
Tallow	1 cent per pound.
Tomatoes	10 per cent.
Tow, of hemp or flax	$10 per ton.
Vegetables, not otherwise provided for	10 per cent.
Wheat	20 cents per bushel.
Wool	25 to 50 per cent.
Yarns	20 to 40 per cent.

Under these duties foreign importations of agricultural products are kept within reasonable bounds; our own farmers are protected and the product of their labor is largely increased. At the same time the annual export of American agricultural products has more than doubled under the operations of the protective tariffs of the last fifteen years, and amounted in value in 1874 to the enormous sum of $499,383,672. The following are the exports of the last two years:

Export of agricultural products, fiscal years 1874 and 1875.

These figures show the extent of our agricultural exports, the importance of which may be inferred when it is considered that each million of dollars' worth of products of the soil exported causes the retention of a million dollars in gold at home. The decrease in the exports of 1875 as compared with those of 1874 is owing mainly to a falling off in the export of wheat during the latter year. The export of that article in 1874 was largely above the average, and made a corresponding increase in the aggregate exports. But the average export of agricultural products has not in recent years varied far from $500,000,000 per annum, and under the present protective policy will continue to increase in the future.

Not a few of the sophistries of the free-trade fraternity are projected and industriously published with a view of deceiving our farmers. It is asserted that a protective tariff increases the cost of manufactures in iron, clothing, agricultural implements, and other commodities required by farmers, and at the same time reduces the prices of agricultural products. These statements are at variance with the facts. Experience shows with unerring certainty that in nearly every case a protective tariff tends to produce directly opposite results; that under its operations farmers receive better prices for their products and pay less for goods they purchase. This statement is not made at a venture. It is susceptible of proof. Take for illustration fabrics for clothing and compare prices in 1857, under partial free trade, with those of 1875, under a protective tariff.

The following were the current retail prices in the principal cities and communities of the West in each year named. The list was prepared by D. H. Mason, esq., associate editor of the Chicago Inter-Ocean, and may be accepted assubstantially correct:

Statement showing current retail prices of fabrics for clothing in 1857 and 1875.

Articles.	1857.	1875.
Calicoes, prints, per yard	$0 12½	$0 08
Delaines, per yard	25	15
Alpacas, common, per yard	75	35
Alpacas, finer quality, per yard	1 00	40
Alpacas, finest quality, per yard	1 25	45
Woolen cloth, (shoddy in 1857,) good now, per yard	1 00	60
Woolen cloth, better quality, (shoddy in 1857,) good now, per yard	1 25	75
Woolen cloth, best quality, per yard	1 50	1 20
Shawls, each	12 00	8 00
Cotton print-cloth, per yard	08	04½
Raw cotton, per pound	13	15
Spool silk, 100 yards, per dozen	1 25	1 25
Skein silk, per ounce	7 50	7 00
Knit undershirts, each	1 25	50
Knit drawers, each	1 25	50

It will be observed that there is one article of raw material included—cotton—and that cost more in 1875 than in 1857, incidentally showing that the cotton farmer received a better price for his product under a protective tariff than he did under partial free trade. All the other articles with one exception are materially lower under a high than under a low rate of duties. In many cases the reduction is more than one-half, and so of other goods; nearly all kinds of flannel goods range from 20 to 30 per cent. less in price now than they did in 1857. Carpets of our own manufacture are lower now than ever before, on a gold basis; and so also are standard doeskins, satinets, tweeds, and cassimeres, as has been demonstrated repeatedly by a comparison of present and former prices in the best establishments in the cities of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia.

Again, take the article of agricultural implements. Every intelligent farmer knows that he can buy to better advantage now than he could under the low tariffs of former years, while his implements have been multiplied in variety and improved in quality. The Chicago Evening Journal, November 5, 1875, stated that in a recent interview with the manager of the largest manufactory in the Northwest, that of Messrs. Furst & Bradley, he said:

It is impossible to compare the price of plows in 1857, 1858, 1859, and 1860 with the price during the past four years. There is no more resemblance between a plow of those years and now than there is between daylight and darkness. A plow such as we sell now would then have cost 100 per cent. more to manufacture than it costs now with such facilities as we then had. As a general rule, the prices of agricultural implements are nearly the same as before the war, but the goods now sold are worth 100 per cent. more. They are of better quality, more convenient, will last longer, are better adapted to the wants of the farm, and are in every respect cheaper than the goods sold before the war; but a mere comparison of our price catalogues for those years with those of the past four years would be unfair, for they indicate no change in quality. We have been buying stock at a continual decline in price for several years past, but the improvements which have been made each year more than offset this decline. We are continually putting more work and better work upon our implements.

One of the partners confirmed this statement, and added:

"I make the knock-down argument that we will take such farm produce as we consume at the prices which prevailed before the war and sell goods at ante-war prices. Any farmer who wants implements for his own use can come here any day and get them on these terms." When the improved quality of the implements is considered, this offer, by a responsible party, is effectually conclusive as to the relative value of farm produce and agricultural implements.

Again, take the articles of iron and steel, which enter largely, directly and indirectly, into agricultural economy in the manufacture of implements and in building railways for transportation. In 1854, under a low tariff, the price of pig-iron was $37.50 per ton in gold; on the 1st day of January, 1876, it was quoted in our principal markets at $23 per ton in currency.

In the manufacture of Bessemer steel rails, we have the following results. The quotation is from the report of the American Iron and Steel Association for 1871, and it forcibly shows the advantage of a tariff that enables our manufacturers to open successfully new industries:

In 1864, just before the completion of the first Bessemer steel works in this country, the price of English steel rails in New York and Philadelphia was $162 in gold. In 1865 two works were in operation here, and foreign rails were lowered to $120. Two years later, in 1867, a third works started, and two or three new companies were organized to further extend the manufacture, and foreign rails fell to $110, gold, per ton. In 1869 the capacity of our works was equal to the American demand, nearly $5,000,000 had been invested in the business, and foreign rails were put down to $80, gold, per ton. At that price they could not be made here, and the business was threatened with destruction. Ninety-five intelligent consumers of steel rails alarmed at the prospect of being placed at the mercy of foreign makers, appealed to Congress to save our manufacturers by increasing the duty on imported rails. This was done, our works responded with renewed vigor to the increasing home demand, the price rose to a point at which a moderate profit could be made, (about $105 per ton,) and has since fluctuated but little. There can scarcely be a doubt that, had Congress not acted promptly in the premises, our works would have been closed, the capital invested in them sunk, their skilled labor driven into some other occupation, and the business so disorganized that, before resumption of operations could have taken place, American consumers would have suffered as severely as in the two instances previously given.

Other Bessemer works have since been erected, and the price of steel rails has been further reduced to $75 per ton currency, or $66 in gold, "a lower price," says Wharton, in his National Self-Protection, published in 1875, "than that of iron rails two years ago, but little higher than steel rails could be landed here now from England duty free, and doubtless $25 per ton lower than they could be had duty free if our works had not by protection been called into existence.

Cheap rails cheapen the cost of railroads and lessen the charges for the transportation of wheat, corn, potatoes, cattle, and other agricultural products, and thus benefits the farmer.

Take another illustration of the benefits of protection in reducing the cost of articles used by farmers; and what is said of axes applies equally to edge tools generally:

The manufacture of axes and other edge-tools was commenced at Hartford, Connecticut, in 1826, by the brothers Collins, who were the first to supply the markets of this country with cast-steel axes ready ground for use. By the tariff of 1828 a protective duty of 35 per cent. was levied upon imported axes. Under this protection the Collins Company introduced labor-saving machinery, much of which was invented, patented, and constructed by themselves. Ultimately their axes altogether superseded the foreign article, on account of superior quality and cheapness. In 1836 foreign and home-made axes were selling side by side in the American market at $15 to $16 per dozen, at which time foreign producers, finding they could make no money at those rates and that our establishments could not be broken down, withdrew from the competition, abandoning the entire market to our own manufacturers. Then home rivalry and improved methods continued the decline of prices. Axes were selling in 1838 at $13 to $15.25 per dozen; in 1843 at $11 to $12; and in 1849 at $8 to $10.

These quotations are based upon the finance report of the United States for 1849, and they show a constant decline of prices, even after the pressure of foreign competition had been withdrawn. Now we are exporters of axes, and are wresting from the English one market after another. Said the Sheffield Telegraph, only a few weeks ago: "The steel of an American ax is so superior to that of an imported ax that no pioneer who understands his business will ever carry any other with him into the wilds." Such are the effects of protective duties and the benefits of a high tariff to farmers.

Illustrations might be multiplied, but enough has been presented to show conclusively that farmers pay less for their supplies under a protective tariff than they paid formerly under partial free trade.

On the other hand, the products of their own labor bring better prices now than they did in former years when the tariff was low. In illustration of this, the following table compiled from a recent reliable work by D. H. Mason, esq., entitled How Western Farmers are Benefited by Protection, are presented. We shall for the sake of brevity confine the illustrations to the staple articles of wheat, flour, corn, and potatoes, though similar results could be shown in reference to all other agricultural products. The figures are derived from the official Commerce and Navigation Reports of the United States Government, and show the quantities exported each year named together with the aggregate value and the prices at the port of departure.

Here again the quantity is larger, the aggregate value greater, and the price higher under protection than under partial free trade.

Does this show—

that the protective policy is detrimental to the prosperity of western farmers? If the 39,713,318 barrels of flour exported in the protective period had been sent abroad at the same average price received for the 36,745,003 barrels exported in the period of partial free trade, then the total export value would have amounted to only $241,196,454, instead of $291,470,987, the sum actually realized, making a difference, which would have been a loss, of $50,274,533. Is that value of more than $50,000,000, which represents a positive gain, to be regarded as part of the baneful effects produced upon our agriculture by the series of tariffs since 1861? Are better prices and larger sales usually looked upon as very serious evils and as oppressive to the grain-grower? We put these questions to the common sense of the reader.

These figures establish a number of significant facts all strongly in favor of the protective policy. Here we find during the thirteen years under that system an export of over 207,000,000 bushels of Indian corn against an export of only 82,000,000 bushels during the thirteen years of partial free trade, and an increase under protection in the price of over six cents per bushel—that is, an increase of 150 per cent. in the quantity and 10 per cent in the price—thus augmenting the value of the export under protection over $13,000,000, or $1,000,000 each year in favor of the protective policy. This does not look like injuring the farmer or diminishing the rewards of his labor.

Here we find results similar to those in reference to the export of corn. During the protective period the aggregate export of potatoes increased 119 per cent. in quantity, 24 per cent. in the average price per bushel, and 136 per cent. in aggregate value over the free-trade period.

With these facts before them it will be difficult to find any considerable number of farmers who prefer free trade to a well-adjusted protective tariff like that now in successful operation under the republican party.

It has been the cry of the advocates of a free-trade policy that protection diminished the aggregate of our exports. But instead of this the official returns demonstrate the fact that the export of agricultural products has doubled under the protective tariff. Hon. Horace Capron, late United States Commissioner of Agriculture, shows in his carefully prepared reports that our total wheat exports, together with flour reduced to wheat, for forty years prior to the date of his reports, were 670,000,000 bushels. By adopting the same process of reducing the flour to bushels of wheat, and adding the product to the number of bushels of wheat exported during the last thirteen years of protection, it will be found that the total export of that article falls but little short of the total export of the forty years indicated in Mr. Capron's reports. The export of the year 1874 alone amounts to about one-seventh of that of the forty years indicated. These results all tend directly to one conclusion, namely, that our agricultural products are larger and the prices are better under the protective policy than they are under partial free trade. The reasons for this are obvious. The farmer is better paid for the products of his labor; he is enabled to expend larger amounts in the purchase of improved implements and in paying for hired help; he cultivates a broader surface, and as a direct result has a larger surplus product to send to foreign markets.

OTHER RESULTS OF A PROTECTIVE TARIFF IN ITS RELATION TO AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRIES.

But while our aggregate agricultural product and the quantities of the same exported have largely increased under the republican policy of protection, another and probably the greatest of all the advantages of this policy to the agricultural interests is the fact that it has doubled the aggregate of our manufacturing industries and secured to the farmers larger and more profitable markets at home. Manufacturing establishments, instead of being confined mainly to the New England and Middle States, are now spread over all the States. The shuttle and the plow speed their way side by side. The woolen-mill and the cotton-factory attract population; a community, then a village, and very soon a town springs up and a market is created for the agricultural products of the neighborhood. These mills and factories multiply through the Southern and Western States, and the home market for the surplus products of the soil spreads and increases with the increase and development of manufacturing industry, each becoming a direct benefit to the other and their interests becoming mutual and inseparable. These home markets are always reliable and permanent, while the foreign market is variable and uncertain, depending upon the abundance or deficiency of the European crops. The home markets are also superior to the foreign in the fact that they obviate the necessity of three thousand miles of transportation. Again, the home market creates a demand for a greater variety of agricultural products than the foreign. Hay, on account of its bulky character, cannot be exported at a profit. Perishable vegetables and fruits cannot be sent abroad. But the home market, created by the introduction of manufacturing establishments, enlarges the demand for every variety of agricultural products. This in turn very soon doubles the money value of the farm itself, increases the wealth of the farmer, and guarantees to him permanent sales and remunerative prices for all the fruits of his industry.

These are some of the results of the protective policy. But there is another advantage not yet taken into the account, of having the products of the soil consumed near the place of production, and that is the greater opportunities thus afforded for obtaining a sufficient supply of fertilizers to sustain the productive powers of the soil. It is mainly upon the consumption of agricultural products that the farmer depends for manure. When his crops are sent abroad this element is lost. He cannot afford to ship back from Europe the fertilizing product of breadstuffs and provisions he has sent thither. This is lost and his farm suffers in consequence. Says a recent writer:

To take from the soil and not wear it out the farmer must give back. Let this be done, and the crops increase with the growth of population; neglect this and when decay shall come is but a question of time; come it will inevitably.

Another writer truthfully remarks that:

In New England, with a poor soil, crops increase; in the West, with a rich virgin soil, they decrease in the average per acre. In New England factory and farm are near each other, making a home market for the farmer's produce and enabling him to procure manure to enrich his soil. In the West, the produce being carried off, the soil loses thousands of tons of its most precious constituents for crops and receives no equivalent. Put the factory beside the farm and this drain is stopped.

These are self-evident truths, and are practically evident to every intelligent farmer.

Now, the Morrison tariff, based on the democratic free-trade policy, deprives the present republican tariff of its protective feature. Should it be adopted, the practical effect would be to stop the increase of factories throughout the country and close many, if not all, of those now in existence, and transfer the manufacture of our goods for home consumption to England, Germany, and France, whither our gold and silver would be shipped to pay for our foreign purchases, while our own manufacturers would turn their hundreds of thousands of employés out of doors and our farmers would be left without markets for their surplus products. Verily the road to ruin is easy, and the democratic policy is to compel our people to walk therein.

EFFECTS OF THE TARIFF UPON PRICES DURING A PERIOD OF HALF A CENTURY.

In order more completely to disarm the advocates of free trade of the claim that a protective tariff cheapens agricultural products and enhances the cost of other commodities required by farmers, the following table is presented for examination. In it will be found the wholesale prices in the New York markets on the 1st day of January in each year from 1825 to 1876, inclusive. The articles enumerated are chiefly staple agricultural products, to which are added coal, iron, lead, and leather. To demonstrate the effects of a protective tariff in sustaining the prices of agricultural products and decreasing the cost of manufactured goods, it is not necessary here to go over the figures of each year in detail. The prices, as indicated in the table, are reliable, and the last two columns show the percentage of duties paid each year.

From 1816 till 1824 the duties were low, and they were imposed mainly on coarse and unmanufactured products. The tariff during this period was in no way protective, and the country went through an experience of extreme prostration and distress. The tariff of 1824 was slightly protective, and its beneficial effects were so clearly demonstrated, that in 1828 the duties were increased so as to afford effective protection to home industries. By the act of July 4, 1832, the tariff was again modified, and in March following the compromise act was passed, under which the duties were further reduced, and linens, stuff goods, silks, and many other articles were admitted free of duty and one-tenth of the excess over 20 per cent. reduced from all other commodities, to take effect December, 1833, with a further similar reduction every two years until 1841, when one-half of the remaining surplus was to be removed, and the other half in 1842, when no duty would exceed 20 per cent.

The protective tariff of 1842 was followed by the free-trade tariff of 1846. This was continued with unimportant changes through a series of years, and resulted in an experience of extreme prostration from which the country never fully recovered until a protective tariff was established under republican legislation. Then the industries revived, and though checked for a time in consequence of a protracted war, prosperity continued until undue speculation, an overstrained credit system and overproduction compelled a halt until the law of supply and demand could again regulate itself. For this the protective policy was in no way responsible.

Keeping these historical facts in view, an examination of the following statement of prices will show the relation of the tariff to the manufacturing industries, and especially to the agricultural interests of the country. Short or excessive crops intervene sometimes to affect prices; but the steady increase of prices of agricultural products during protective periods is notably apparent from 1825 down to the present time. Compare, for example, the prices in 1826 with those of 1872, years of average prosperity, and the result will at once become apparent. It will be seen that agricultural products have, in nearly every instance, increased largely in price, while coal, iron, lead, &c., have decreased in value, in some cases—that of iron for example—nearly 50 per cent. Similar results are shown by a full analysis of the table here presented:

Statement of wholesale prices of provisions and other staple goods in the New York market on the 1st day of January in each year from 1825 to 1876, inclusive.

(The quotations are for first qualities of goods excepting cotton middlings.)

Year.	Wheat, per bushel.	Flour, per barrel.	Corn, per bushel.	Corn-meal, per barrel.	Coal, per chaldron.	Cotton, middling, per pound.	Iron, pig, per ton.	Lead, pig, per hundred pounds.	Leather, sole, per pound.	Molasses, New Orleans, per gallon.	Molasses, foreign, per gallon.	Pork, mess, per barrel.	Beef, mess, per barrel.	Hams, smoked, per pound.	Lard, per pound.	Butter, per pound.	Cheese, per pound.	Rice, per hundred pounds.	Salt, per bushel.	Sugar, New Orleans, per pound.	Sugar, foreign, per pound.	Wool, per pound.	Percentage of customs on dutiable imports for consumption.	Percentage of customs on total imports.

This table, together with the preceding ones, affords the most conclusive evidence that farmers have nothing to lose but everything to gain by the republican policy of protection, which the democratic party is striving to destroy by a reduction of the tariff and the removal of its protective features. This scheme is a direct attack upon our industries, manufacturing, agricultural, and commercial. They are mutually related one to the other, and so inseparably connected that a blow struck at either will affect the others. The policy of protection is to do equal justice to each and every branch of industry in every section of the country, and past experience has demonstrated the fact of signal success. No legitimate enterprise has in a single instance suffered in consequence of the adoption of the protective policy. On the other hand all our industries have been benefited. There is not an individual of intelligence who attributes the recent crisis in business to the protective tariff. It was the result of other well-known causes. Had it not been for the tariff the depression would have followed immediately upon the close of the war. But the country continued to enjoy an unusual degree of prosperity until reckless speculation and extravagance disarranged legitimate industrial pursuits and paralyzed trade.

Mississippi Levees.

SPEECH OF HON. CASEY YOUNG,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 29, 1876.

The House being as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. YOUNG said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The propriety of addressing the House upon a matter not directly before it for consideration would, in my judgment, under ordinary circumstances, be a somewhat doubtful proposition, and certainly the utility of the proceeding might be fairly questioned. But however this may be, I should not this evening avail myself of a parliamentary privilege which the usages, if not the laws, which govern this body entitle me to exercise, and attempt to interest the House by the discussion of a measure to which the attention of only a few members has been specially called, and which to be interesting at all must be examined and understood in all its details, unless it were one of commanding and paramount importance.

Though the subject of the remarks which I propose now to submit is not formally before Congress for present and immediate action, yet for more than fifty years past it has been before the people of six great States of this Union, engaging their constant attention and most anxious consideration. In their estimation, as it presents itself to their minds in all its force and significance, it most nearly and vitally affects and controls their highest commercial, agricultural, and financial interests. Nor do they in any way magnify its importance or overestimate the vast benefits which it would confer upon them if adopted by the Government and carried into effect. Neither would its benefits and advantages be confined alone to the geographical area I have indicated, and thus be sectional and localized in its operations; but its scope would be wider and broader, extending over the fifteen States which lie in the great valley of the Mississippi, and bringing increased wealth and prosperity to their people.

Nor would its effects be bounded even by these extended limits, but its ultimate and final results would be most forcibly felt in every part of our country, in every industry which engages the energies of our 50,000,000 busy people, and would annually pour into the Treasury of the nation a stream of wealth that would enrich it almost beyond computation. A measure compassing results such as these surely should not only command the attention of Congress, but enlist in its support the efforts and sympathies of the people of all callings and professions in every section of our country.

It will not be suspected that what I have said is the exaggerated conceptions of a mind bewildered by the imaginary magnitude and importance of a favorite enterprise, when it is known to the House that the measure which I am now presenting and propose to advocate has for its purpose the reclamation and development of a vast empire of agricultural wealth now annually submerged and desolated by the angry floods of the Mississippi and its tributary streams.

More than two months ago the Committee on Mississippi Levees, of which I am a member, after a long and careful examination of the subject, submitted to the House an extended and ably written report prepared by its chairman, Hon. E. JOHN ELLIS, a Representative from the State of Louisiana, pointing out the necessity and importance of reclaiming and protecting from overflow the alluvial lands bordering upon the Mississippi and its affluent streams, commencing above the mouth of the Ohio and extending to the Gulf of Mexico; a region of country which for fertility of soil and adaptability to the production in profuse abundance of the most valuable agricultural products is unsurpassed by any other in the whole world that has yet been brought under the dominion of civilized men.

The committee, along with their report, also presented a bill asking Congress to make an appropriation for temporary relief and protection to the dwellers in the more exposed portion of the Mississippi lowlands, and which would serve to inaugurate the larger and more extended system which will be necessary to hold in check that vast flood made up of the mingling of many waters, that every year pours without hinderance over all this fertile region. But even this bill, asking for an appropriation of only $3,000,000, a sum most insignificant compared with the magnitude of the object ultimately sought to be accomplished, the committee has not been able to induce this House to look upon with sufficient favor to afford any reasonable hope that it could have been passed even had it been urged with greater persistency than it has.

For my own part—and I believe I can say as much for the other members of the committee—I yielded my judgment in the matter to that of a large majority of members who believed it to be the duty of the present Congress to enter at once upon a rigid and most relentless system of retrenchment and economy in the administration of public affairs, in order to rescue the Government from the financial embarrassments under which it labors, and which threaten with serious danger every public and private interest.

I do not propose to call up this bill for action at any future day of the present session, and I am therefore not speaking with any hope of securing its immediate passage, but rather for the purpose of getting before the House and the country some statistical and other information which I have gathered from various sources upon this most important and interesting subject, in order that a future session of Congress may give it that attention which the magnitude of the interest it involves entitles it to receive. I cannot better and more concisely outline the region designed to be protected from inundation than to borrow the language of Major A. G. Warfield, an accomplished engineer, who in a learned and scientific paper, submitted by him to the Committee on Mississippi Levees, says:

> There are few divisions of the earth which offer more beautiful illustrations of their adaptations of natural means to an obvious purpose than the physical geography of that portion of the United States which lies between the great lakes and the Gulf of Mexico, and extends from the Alleghany to the Rocky Mountains. From the summit of the latter a great plain slopes gently to the East, along which flow all the streams that enter the Lower Mississippi and the Gulf of Mexico from the West. Another plain, of nearly equal extent and equally gentle in its inclination, descends from the North, along which flows the northern tributaries of the Ohio and Mississippi itself, until it unites with the great Missouri, flowing along the irregular line which marks the intersection of these vast surfaces; while another plain, descending from the summit of the Alleghany range, conveys the waters of the Cumberland and Tennessee, and all the southern tributaries of the Ohio, and intersects the great plain from the north in the valley of the Ohio, and the greater plains from the West in the valley of the Lower Mississippi.
> The intersection of the great slopes from the south and east with those from the north and west, near the confluence of the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio, creates what deserves to be regarded as a geographical center of this remarkable region, a position which is rapidly becoming, from causes depending upon its physical geography, almost entirely the center of commerce, wealth, and population of the whole North American continent.

This writer has not overdrawn the picture of the beauty, geographical advantages, boundless resources, and future greatness of that extended area which he so graphically describes. Divided by the great river of the continent, into which flow from the slopes of the Alleghanies on the east and the Rocky Mountains on the west those tributary streams which bear upon their bosoms the travel and commerce of eight great western States, it is an empire in wealth as well as in extent, possessing every variety of climate, soil, and production, as well as all the facilities for an active and prosperous commerce.

It has been computed that that region of country which is intersected and drained by the Mississippi, and the streams which pour their tide into it from the east and from the west all the way from the mountains to the Gulf, contains within its limits 1,226,600 square miles, and it has been further calculated from data and comparisons which seem reliable that by the close of the present century, or within the first decade thereafter, our population will have increased to nearly 100,000,000, and that of this number not less than 50,000,000 will be found living in the region I have just mentioned, and in half a century its population will average more than forty persons to the square mile.

I give these facts to show the vast scope of the undertaking I am discussing, the great interests it will subserve, and the urgent necessity for its immediate and successful prosecution. But this is not all. What I have said is a mere skeleton outline of the subject; the more important facts are yet to come, facts which address themselves to the practical judgment of men, and which control and govern the action of legislators. That legislation is the wisest and most beneficial which, discarding as far as may be the passions and harsh judgment engendered by mere political exigencies and partisan struggles, seeks to develop every resource, protect every interest of the whole country, and add to the material wealth and prosperity of the whole people. If, therefore, I can convince this House and the country that the measure I propose will accomplish these results, then my task will have been finished, my victory will have been won, and a sense of public duty directing the official action of this body will do the rest.

What is known as the delta of the Mississippi extends from 29° to 30° 30′ north, or reaching across eight and one-half degrees of latitude, being about six hundred miles in length, by an average of something more than sixty in breadth. It embraces within its confines portions of four of the great grain-growing and stock-raising States of the western and middle section of the Union, namely, Missouri, Illinois, Ohio, and Tennessee, while in its very center, below the northern boundary of what is known as the cotton belt, lie the States of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, in which is grown more of those staple products, cotton, sugar, and rice, than in any other three States of the South.

Its area is something over 37,000 square miles, or about 24,800,000 acres, including about 4,000,000 square miles, or a little over 2,500,000 acres of sea-marsh, which is supposed to be irreclaimable at least for many years to come, and therefore almost if not entirely worthless. But outside of this latter there will still remain more than 22,000,000 acres of land lying in a valley richer than that of the Po or the Nile, having a soil that the culture of ages will not exhaust, and which only needs to be protected from inundation to make it the most opulent and inviting agricultural field in the world. Most of it still remains shadowed by the gloomy, impenetrable wilderness of natural growth which has covered it perhaps since the time of its formation, and has never yet been invaded by the pioneer farmer, for the reason that the flood was stronger than any obstruction he could oppose to it, while the comparatively small portion which had been rescued from the wilderness, reduced to cultivation, and made to yield the richest reward for the labor of the husbandman, is now being abandoned to ruin and desolation, because the barriers erected by individual or even State enterprise are too feeble to resist the mighty weight of waters which at every flood tide is hurled against them. Hence it is that the frightful loss and deterioration in the value of property occasioned by this cause in the regions subject to overflow would seem incredible to one who has not examined the facts and made the estimate from data that cannot be questioned.

A hasty calculation in connection with this subject, based upon figures that I suppose are at least very nearly correct, would reveal sad and astounding results as to the devastation and ruin which have been wrought in the Lower Mississippi country by overflows in the past sixteen years.

In order, however, to arrive at a correct conclusion in relation to this branch of the matter, it will be necessary for us to go back to a period something over half a century ago, and commence our investigation when levees were in their infancy, and when only a very small proportion of the alluvial lands were protected by them from inundation. Assuming that at the time referred to the 22,500,000 acres of land subject to overflow—but which it is estimated can be reclaimed by levees—was worth without such protection $1.25 per acre, we would have as the total value of the whole the sum of $26,125,000. I am aware that this is a most liberal calculation, and gives an amount which greatly exceeds the proper limit, as I am quite sure that more than half the land mentioned could not be sold for more than ten cents per acre without some sort of protection from the water.

Hon. Frank Morey, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana, in a careful and able review of the subject, puts the total value of these lands at only $8,524,325 unreclaimed, and I think it highly probable that his computation is nearer correct than my own. But either is sufficiently accurate to show the vast increase in their value, when but 5,120,000 acres were only partially protected by an imperfect system of levees, built by individual planters or under authority of the different States in which they were located, and also to show the enormous and alarming decrease in their value resulting from the numerous breaks and partial destruction of these levees since the year 1860.

In 1860, with 5,120,000 acres inclosed by levees, the whole 22,500,000 acres alluded to before were worth $368,053,520, showing an increase in the property value of the country of $340,000,000 in less than fifty years; and this wonderful appreciation is mainly due to the protection afforded the tillers of the soil in that region by such imperfect levees as had then been constructed.

Now let us see the results that have followed the breaking and, to some extent, the destruction of large portions of these safeguards all along the shores of the Mississippi River from Cairo to New Orleans. The fine corn-producing lands in Southern Missouri and Northern Arkansas have been again and again submerged by vast volumes of water that flow over them unrestrained, drowning domestic animals, sweeping away fences, buildings, and farming utensils, while the unfortunate owners, impotent to stay the flood, could only look quietly upon the waste of their property and the ruin of their homes. Lower down toward the richer regions of the South the effect of these repeated overflows has been more wide-spread and disastrous, destroying the finest cotton and sugar plantations in the States of Southern Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, compelling the owners to surrender them to the deluge and the wilderness from which they had rescued them by years of industry and labor.

In the river counties and parishes of these States there are large tracts of land that were a few years ago beautiful farms in the highest state of cultivation, blooming like very gardens with the richest products of southern soil and climate, that now present a striking picture of ruin and desolation. The levees having given way before the swelling tide of the Mississippi, its waters pouring over its banks have obliterated every mark of the plowshare and the hoe, and the beautiful level plains, where but a little while ago the cotton stalk and sugar-cane grew in rich luxuriance, is now covered by the rank forest growth indigenous to alluvial soils. Millions of acres of this land, which could be made so valuable, have been sold for taxes because they have been ruined and their owners have been impoverished for the want of that protection which the General Government can alone afford; for the States, however able they might be to accomplish such an undertaking in a financial view, could afford no adequate relief, for reasons which I shall endeavor to make manifest before I close my remarks.

The lands which were in 1860 worth the large sum of more than $350,000,000 have since that time decreased in value until they are now estimated to be worth only $100,000,000, thus showing an actual loss in the producing taxable wealth of the country of something like $250,000,000.

This, it will be seen, only comprises the direct and actual injury to the landed property, and does not include the value of the agricultural products that have been destroyed, which it would be impossible to calculate correctly; but an approximate estimate may be made.

By calculations made from data furnished by chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and facts obtained from other reliable sources of information, it is estimated that the losses sustained in the overflowed country by the flood of 1874 was not less than $13,000,000, while the damage done in the succeeding year 1875 reached nearly $10,000,000. Thus in two years the loss of agricultural products amounts to more than $20,000,000. Since 1860 there have been seven great overflows in the Mississippi and in some of the streams which are tributary to it, occurring in the years 1862, 1865, 1868, 1871, 1874, 1875, and 1876.

While the losses inflicted by the floods of 1874 and 1875 may not be a fair standard by which to estimate the losses of the other years I have enumerated, yet it is estimated in a carefully prepared paper by a prominent merchant in a large commercial city, and which I now have before me, that the destruction of cotton, sugar, rice, and other southern farm products, resulting from the different overflows since 1860, would average in value for each one of them the sum of $8,000,000, amounting in the aggregate—leaving out the present year—to $48,000,000. This added to the $250,000,000 of the depreciation in the value of lands, would make the enormous sum of $298,000,000, that has been subtracted from our material and active wealth within a period of fifteen years, and all resulting from a single cause.

How long will the people and the Government of the United States permit this vast destruction of property and the resources of national and individual wealth to continue, with no effort to stay it? is a most pertinent and important inquiry, and one which I shall consider it my duty to reiterate so long as I may hold a seat in Congress or until it is answered by a prompt application of the means necessary to hold the raging flood in subjection.

A still further examination of this subject in respect to the immense losses that have actually occurred for want of a proper system of levees and the enormous wealth that will accrue from their prompt and speedy construction may prove an interesting study and pleasant recreation to the large number of distinguished statesmen who have devoted their thoughts and energies in so commendable a spirit of rivalry to the solution of those perplexing problems suggested by our present financial policy.

If there is any one great staple agricultural product, any single commercial commodity which controls the markets of the world, and which can disturb and derange the commerce of other nations, cotton is the article which more nearly meets these conditions than any other. It has been demonstrated by repeated and costly experiments that no part of the earth's surface has a soil and climate so perfectly adapted to the production of cotton as are found in the southern States of this country whose borders are washed by the waters of the Mississippi. We can not only raise this great staple cheaper, with less labor, and in greater abundance than in any other cotton-growing region of the world, but that of American growth is of superior fiber and quality, commands a higher price in the market, and is greatly superior to any other known to commerce and manufactures for all the purposes to which it is applied. So it will be seen that in the production of this article no other country can compete with us and that we need fear no rival in this branch of agriculture and commerce.

And the same may be said as respects the production of sugar and rice, those great commodities of commerce that have grown to be necessities in nearly every civilized country, and the consumption of which is every day increasing. The sugar plantations on the Red and Lower Mississippi Rivers are unsurpassed in producing power by those in the most favored localities of Cuba or the West Indies; while nearer the sea-coast, and along the borders of the lakes, rice grows in greater abundance and of finer quality than on the lands irrigated by the Ganges or the Nile.

The entire cotton crop for the year 1875 was something over 4,000,000 bales, which computed at the low price of ten cents per pound was worth on an average $50 per bale, which would give a grand aggregate value of $200,000,000.

That these estimates are low ones, falling greatly below the figures which would represent the real facts of the case, will appear from the following statistics taken from an authorized official compilation:

In 1875 there was exported from the United States 1,155,970,783 pounds of the ordinary cotton grown in the Gulf States of the South, and 4,420,120 of the finer textured variety, known as sea island, grown in the peculiar soil and milder climate of the Florida coast.

The value of the former is put down in official reports at $189,099,856, and the latter at $1,538,769, making as the combined value of the two the sum of $190,638,625.

In addition to this our exportations included manufactured goods of cotton fabrics, valued at $4,071,881, which, added to the former amount, gives us the total value of cotton and cotton manufactuers we sent during the last year to the markets of other countries the sum of $194,710,506.

During the same year we exported 362,552 pounds of brown sugar, worth, in round numbers, $31,111; 23,780,836 pounds of refined sugar, worth $2,585,382; also 3,375,995 gallons of molasses, worth $1,135,995, and lastly, 279,337 pounds of rice, worth $19,831, making the aggregate value of these few commodities of export amount to the sum of $198,762,825. Thus it will be seen that those agricultural products peculiar to the Southern States, but for the most part grown in those rich alluvial regions which spread out northward from the Gulf and eastward and westward from the Mississippi River, constitute in value nearly one-third of our entire exports, the total of which for last year was $643,094,767. Leaving out breadstuffs and gold and silver coin and bullion, no other ten or even twenty articles in the list would equal in value those I have enumerated.

Now suppose that by a wise act of legislation those immense values could be doubled and the means which create them could be increased a hundred-fold within a decade of years, would not the American Congress fail of discharging one of its highest duties and be justly chargeable with neglecting one of the greatest of our public interests if it did not take prompt and immediate action to secure such a result? This proposition being submitted, the natural inquiry would be, is it possible to accomplish results so valuable and important; can such vast interests be subserved and such immense resources be developed by any single legislative act? I give in answer to these questions higher authority than my own opinion.

More than a quarter of a century ago General A. A. Humphreys, then a young captain in the United States Army, but now the distinguished Chief of Engineers, in connection with Lieutenant H. L. Abbott, made a careful survey of all the Mississippi delta, with a view of determining the practicability of protecting it from overflow, and the best method of doing so.

And as the result of his labors and investigations, he published to the world his invaluable work upon the Physics and Hydraulics of the Mississippi River. Nothing connected with the country he was sent to explore and the subject he was to examine escaped his watchful and critical observation, and the fund of information upon which he based his conclusions is of great interest and value to the scientist and the student of political and agricultural economy.

Fifteen years after the publication of this book its distinguished author made another survey of the same region for a similar purpose, and in his report of the same, transmitted to the Secretary of War on the 31st day of May, 1866, speaking of the section which ought and could be reclaimed and protected by levees, says:

> Of this area 12,300 square miles is below Red River, and belongs to the sugar region.
> Under a proper system of protection and drainage, one-third of it may be entirely open and cultivated, or 2,500,000 acres.

Suppose this were done and only one-half of this immense acreage cultivated in sugar, and that it would produce one hogshead of that staple per acre, together with molasses and sirup in corresponding quantities, it would, calculating upon the basis of 1875, increase our sugar productions in quantity from 24,143,388 pounds to more than 200,000,000; and in value from $2,116,473 to more than $20,000,000; while at the same time the amount of sirup and molasses would be increased from 3,375,995 gallons to nearly $30,000,000, with a value augmented from $1,135,995 to more than $10,000,000; making a total increase in the wealth accruing from the culture of the sugar-cane of something over $25,000,000 annually.

General Humphreys, describing the same subject, further says:

> Of the remaining 19,400 square miles, perhaps 3,000 square miles may be north of the cotton region, leaving some 16,000 square miles within that region of the most fertile alluvium, two-thirds of which may finally be rendered cultivable under a proper system of levees and drainage.
> This would give 7,000,000 acres of cultivated land capable of growing a bale of cotton to the acre, or about double the whole cotton crop of the United States in 1860.

If this supposition of General Humphreys be correct that this land can be reclaimed, and that its producing qualities are as great as he states them, by bringing it into cultivation we increase our cotton crop to more than 10,000,000 bales, and its value, taking our table of exports for 1875 as a basis of calculation, from $194,710,506 to more than $500,000,000; a sum only about $100,000,000 short of the value of our total exports of all kinds for the past year.

Now add to this sum the $30,000,000 increase in the value of our sugar productions, to say nothing of other articles, we have an annual appreciation of $530,000,000 in our agricultural wealth, not estimated in demonetized silver nor depreciated currency, but in solid gold that circulates with equal credit and value in all parts of the civilized world. Here we have an income from an inexhaustible source which would in five years discharge our public debt and give an impetus to our trade and commerce that would enrich us as a nation and dispense a prosperity among our people never before equaled. This is no fanciful conception, based upon imaginary figures and facts which do not exist, but it is a conclusion resulting from a careful examination of official statistics that may be relied upon as entirely correct.

In view of what I have already said, the next inquiry that would be naturally suggested would be our looking to the ascertainment of the most feasible means of reclaiming our vast alluvial delta from overflow, the coinage of the immense wealth which I have computed, and the cost which the application of these means would involve.

The first of these questions I do not propose to discuss, involving as it does various and widely divergent theories for the protection of overflowed lands which have from time to time been advanced by different scientific men in this country and Europe; but I am content to rest this problem in the hands of the scientific officers of the Government. They are better fitted to decide he matter intelligently and correctly than is the politician or legislator. It is only for us to determine that the work shall be done, and let the officer of another Department of the Government suggest and direct its proper execution. In speaking upon the subject I have used the word "levees" as expressive of the method of reclaiming and protecting the region liable to overflow; but I have done this for convenience, and not that I intended to indicate as my own belief that this is the only or even best way of effecting the desired result.

I have not had an opportunity of making sufficiently careful and extended personal observations to enable me to judge advisedly of the matter, nor am I sufficiently learned in engineering science to risk my own judgment in the determination of so grave a question. I have examined with some care the other two theories proposed by some scientific writers, that is, a system of reservoirs or of canals and outlets, and I have concluded that the weight of authority is against these latter projects, and that a well-designed system of levees, coupled with proper drainage, gives greater hope of attaining the desired object than any other method that has yet been suggested or devised.

Many cogent reasons have been given by gentlemen eminently qualified to judge why any other system than that of levees would fail of affording the desired protection, and would tend rather to aggravate than to remedy the evil. Upon this, however, I must refer to the same high authority I have already quoted, and also to Major-General G. K. Warren, United States Army, an officer distinguished as an engineer, who was made president of a board of commissioners composed of Army engineers, appointed by the President of the United States under an act of Congress of June 4, 1874, to investigate and report a permanent plan for the reclamation, &c., of the alluvial lands of the Mississippi River. In a report of this investigation and survey made to the President on the 16th day of January, 1875, he says:

> It being certain that the alluvial regions of the Mississippi can only be reclaimed by levees, it remains to consider what experience has taught respecting them. The existing system was begun a century and a half ago, near New Orleans, and has gradually extended upward until there are but few points on the river where it has not been tried.
> The crops of cotton, sugar, corn, and rice heretofore gathered from the alluvial region, with all the existing wealth of lands, &c., are the direct fruits of this method of protecting the country against overflow.

In respect to the necessary cost of putting in operation this system of reclamation and protection, the same distinguished officer in the report referred to estimates the whole expenditure required to construct sufficient levees in addition to those now in existence to secure the entire delta from inundation at $45,000,000.

I have gone into the discussion and examination of this subject more in detail and at greater length than was pleasant to me or perhaps interesting to the House; but I have done so in order that it might be fairly and fully understood.

Now, the proposition is presented of whether or not we will invest $45,000,000 in a venture that will bring an annual return of more than $500,000,000, or shall we continue our comparatively unprofitable, barren work on the angry discussion of political theories and partisan questions of little consequence to the toiling millions who expect at our hands legislation that will give labor and thrift to them and wealth and prosperity to the country?

Would any other government in the world fail longer to utilize this immense source of productive wealth or allow so vast a region of unequaled fertility of soil to remain longer without protection against the desolation every year brought upon it by the destructive flood.

All the mints and mines from Philadelphia to San Francisco contain in their vaults and caverns no such vast wealth as now lies buried in the bosom of the Mississippi delta.

To secure the little gold which is supposed to exist beneath the barren rocks and rugged surface of the Black Hills, men have left the delights of home and the society of civilized people and gone to wander amid hardships and dangers over that desolate country. To protect these wild adventurers in their search for gold in a country where they had no right to go, our Government has been drawn into a war, in violation of solemn treaty stipulations, that has already cost the lives of more than five hundred American soldiers and citizens, and that before the end is reached will cost millions of dollars and probably the early extermination of a whole race of people.

And yet without loss of blood or the expenditure of more money than this unfortunate war will in all probability cost, we might open and develop a source of wealth richer and more lasting than all the gold and silver mines of the Black Hills or California.

Enterprises like the one I am urging have been undertaken and successfully prosecuted by other nations at a cost greatly in excess of the figures I have mentioned, and yet they have yielded the richest return. The waters of the Rhine, the Odega, the Volga, and the Po were formerly wont in seasons of high tide to rise above their banks and overflow the adjacent country, rendering it useless for cultivation. But the governments of the countries through which they flow, wiser than ours has proven itself to be, long ago made it a national undertaking, and erected those great works which now hold within their bounds the swelling flood which would otherwise sweep over the lowlands, carrying destruction in its pathway.

The valleys which border these streams, which were once but little better than swamps and marshes, producing nothing of agricultural or commercial value, are now fields of the busiest industry, giving employment, subsistence, and comfort to millions of prosperous and contented people.

Why not do the same thing and with the same result to our great Mississippi and the other rivers which converge upon it and pour their waters into its bosom?

Do this, protect from overflow the rich regions through which they flow, open them up to the industry of the farmer, and a hardy, energetic population, seeking fields where labor finds its highest reward, will pour into it from the north, the east, and the west. Capital, ever finding its way to localities where it can be invested with the largest profit, coming in millions, will lend its powerful aid to subdue the wilderness and to foster and build up the great industries which will find their home in this favored region.

I am aware that the spirit of retrenchment and economy which universally pervades the public mind of the country, and the influence of which has largely controlled this Congress in making appropriations for public works, is a gratifying evidence of a healthy reaction after a season of great extravagance; but yet it may be carried to an extent to become hurtful to the public interest. And while I have in the main most heartily indorsed and supported those measures looking to retrenchment and the economical administration of public affairs, yet I am not wholly prepared to subscribe to the wisdom of that system of economy which in times of financial distress and dearth of employment for the laboring classes would withhold from them that assistance and relief which would be afforded by a reasonable disbursement of public money in the prosecution of public works.

The example of other nations teaches a different lesson in political economy. In seasons of the greatest monetary want among the people other governments have carried forward their greatest public works, and these experiments have worked the most happy results. I am unable to see any good reason why they would not follow a similar policy in this country. Commence the great enterprise, the future advantages of which I have been trying in these remarks to foreshadow, and you give useful employment to many thousands of willing hands and strong arms that are now folded in idleness because there is no field of industry in which they can labor.

Idleness brings discontent and engenders a moral, social, and political atmosphere which breeds corruption and wickedness, in which evil passions are born, in which lawless acts and violence find sanction and protection, and which sooner or later brings ruin to a people, decay and death to a nation.

Foster and build up the great industries of the country, develop its boundless resources, and we shall be great and prosperous beyond parallel in the history of nations. Let us "cease the agitation and discussion of those useless and exasperating questions which have their birth in mere partisan hostility and hatred, and which it were better for the whole American people if they could be forever driven from American politics, and direct our efforts to the accomplishment of higher and nobler aims. Reconstruct our industrial, agricultural, and commercial system, and social policy and political affairs will reconstruct themselves without legislative assistance. And with wealth pouring into the coffers of the nation and prosperity diffused among the people, we will require no law to adjust our trembling monetary system, nor to fix the date of specie resumption. Nor will we hear again that cry for financial relief by special legislation, which has within the past few months resounded through these halls, striking terror to the faint heart of many an aspiring statesman.

During the present session of Congress many unjust, harsh, and, as I have thought, ungenerous things have been said of the supposed political designs and intentions of those members who came from the section of country which I in part represent in this body; but I am willing to believe that they were for the most part hasty utterances, evoked by the evil spirit of party, dominant only for the moment, in the heat of political debate, and did not express the calm conclusions of those from whom they came. But, however this may be, it has been more than intimated that the southern representatives were willing to prostitute their positions and sacrifice the public interest to secure legislation for the promotion of local interests and for the securing of local benefits. To this uncharitable criticism, to this unjust and unfounded imputation, it is not my present purpose to make any direct reply, further than to say that the legislation which I am now seeking does not in any way partake of the kind mentioned.

Of all legislation, that which is sectional in its character, which is obtained by appeals to purely sectional interests or hostility, is the most dangerous and pernicious. Such legislation, I believe, is unknown in any government but our own; and it will be a most gratifying emblem of progress when we shall learn to profit by the example of other nations of the world in this particular. I do not ask the passage of this measure upon any such ground. It is a matter of as vital interest to the North, the East, and the West as it is to the South; and if any benefits are to result from it, all sections will share them alike. The great river which flows through the rich region I would reclaim, having its sources in the springs and rivulets which feed the northern lakes and gathering the full volume of its current from those streams which drain the country east and west of its course, sweeps by the great western States, furnishing a highway of travel, commerce, and trade to the markets of the Gulf, while these send back in turn to the towns and cities of the West the wealth gathered from the rich fields of the southern delta.

The New England manufacturers will again set their idle machinery in motion, giving employment to thousands of skilled operatives who are eager for honest, active labor. The great marts of trade and money-centers of the East and North will reap the rich financial harvest which will be brought to them by the annual flow of $500,000,000 through their channels of commerce and trade.

I have pointed out but few of the advantages that would result from the passage of this measure, but I have given an outline of its importance, and said enough, I trust, to secure for it some consideration from the people of the country and their Representatives in the next session of Congress.

I do not want it for the benefit of my section alone, but for the sturdy yeomanry of the West, the merchant of the North, the artisan of the East, as well as for the laborers of every class in the South. In the name of all these I shall continue to ask for this legislation until Congress shall listen to their demand.

Appropriations.

SPEECH OF HON. HORACE F. PAGE,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 29, 1876.

The House being as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. PAGE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: When Thaddeus Stevens stood upon this floor and battled as he alone could battle for the reconstruction of the States which had been in rebellion against the national authority, and when, with his high courage and matchless will, he warred against lukewarmness, vacillation, and cowardice in the national councils, and advocated in advance of all others such measures as subsequently found embodiment and culmination in the fifteenth amendment, his highest hope, as he expressed it, was to live to see the day when this Government, fulfilling a high and glorious destiny, should be resolved into "a political paradise." What that bravest and strongest of the statesmen of our day meant was that he hoped to be spared to witness the time when the Government of the United States should show itself to be animated by the spirit of a real and not a pretended democracy; when even and exact justice should be supreme in all the land; and when, in short, the principles so solemnly enunciated by the Declaration of Independence should find a constant and conscientious application everywhere and always. Perhaps it is well for his peace of mind that he did not live to see these degenerate days. Perhaps it is for the best that the republican party in the House of Representatives lost its ablest, if not its only, leader before the time should come when he might see upon this floor, in the persons and presence of an opposition dominated by an unrepentant confederate majority, the temporary arrest of all his noble plans and a rude attempt at baffling his highest hopes and loftiest aspirations.

Mr. Speaker, I am not here to complain of the temporary restoration to power in the South of that element in the politics of that section of the Republic which made an attempt at secession a possibility, and which, foiled and frustrated and beaten by the blows of war into an unconditional surrender, has been far too successful in accomplishing by strategy, fraud, and intimidation what it failed to achieve in the results of a conflict of arms itself had invoked and which was decided upon battle-fields of its own selecting. I am not here to complain of this, nor yet of anything else which, however distasteful to those who have seen the halls and doors of this end of the Capitol differently guarded, has since December last been enacted upon this floor. I am not here to utter any regrets that my party does not now control the action of this House. I am not addressing myself to this body in a tone of despondency over a lost cause; but, rather, I take this occasion briefly to pass in review what a restored democracy has done for a country that it sought in vain to divide, and what, subsequent to that failure, it has sought to accomplish by the legislation and non-legislation of the past eight months.

In view of passing events it may not be altogether profitless to analyze what has been done here since December last; for it has been charged, with no little vehemence and earnestness of statement by a portion of the press, that the representatives of the late confederacy, assisted and sustained by their allies who come from northern constituencies, have sought to bring on, by disastrous impediments and perverse law-making, what the secessionists of 1861 sought to achieve.

by armed revolt. The other side of this House, inspired by the spirit of the departed prophet of a new departure, came, bringing with them tawdry garlands devised by clumsy artifice to imitate the fresh and cheering flowers and fruitage which in an earlier day had garnished the tables of the republican party—came, professing to follow in good faith the advancing steps that had been taken by the political organization under whose rule the Union was saved and reconstruction accomplished. They came here professing a solicitude to let bygones be by-gones; they came, heralded by an exultant press, as the popular champions by whose hands prevailing distresses should be relieved; they came here big with promises to alleviate the alarming condition of affairs which, as they have not failed to tell us, reaches into all parts of the country and is felt by all classes of people.

Mr. Speaker, I said I did not stand here to-day to complain that the democracy of the South had regained their ascendency in this body; but I have taken it upon myself to recapitulate their acts and ask them, yea, and their constituents and the people of this great Republic, what beneficent acts they have done and what system of legislation perfected entitling them to supersede the republican party in the control of this Government.

If my constant attendance upon the sittings of this session have not been utterly profitless; if my careful and earnest observation of passing events has not been lacking in intelligence or perverted by something more blinding than mere party bias, there never has been since the formation of this Republic so shameful a disregard of the interests of the country, never so much precious time wasted, never such a flagrant perversion of the functions of this body from their legitimate channels as has been witnessed here since the opening of the Forty-fourth Congress. Leading gentlemen upon the other side, audaciously scouting the idea that this is a nation, find an eager following in the carrying out of a preconcerted scheme to demolish the republican party in the North as effectively as the White League does its work in abolishing negro suffrage at the South. Democratic orators, who, to gain place and power at the hands of northern constituencies, have done much less service in support of the institutions of the country, are only too eager to join hands with our deluded southern brethren to block the wheels of legislation by preposterous and worse than senseless, ay, malignant efforts at bringing every department of the public service to a stand-still upon the very verge of bankruptcy.

Go to the various Departments of the Government and witness their distress. Go to the Treasury, the War Office, the Postal Department, the Agricultural Bureau, the headquarters of the Signal Service, the Coast Survey, and learn of the lamentable condition to which they have been brought by the mischievous labors of the protracted democratic convention which sits on yonder side of this Chamber. Why, sir, when I remember that the noble Dome which lifts its comely form above this Capitol was reared even while the ears of those whose cunning hands were building it tingled with the startling boom of rebel guns; when I remember that even amidst the throes of a mighty war, when all the energies of this Government were needed to arrest rebellion and crush the shell of a southern confederacy, the industries of the free States were prosperously pursued; when I recall the sublime faith of the people of the North in the ultimate success of all they cared for most, even when the most they cared for was son or brother or lover, who was gone to the perilous edge of battle; when I bring to mind all these facts and conditions of the time of the great civil war, and then look at this most direful, this most humiliating condition of peace; the institutions of the country almost paralyzed; confidence shaken, and the stoutest-hearted depressed with doubt and wearied with anxiety, the contrast between loyal endeavor and its results and a sinister political purpose and its consequences forces itself upon me, and I confess that it seems only too apparent that those States which were so effectually coerced into remaining in a Union from which they sought violent separation are now afforded a most alarming opportunity to wreak a malignant and direful revenge upon the Federal fabric. They have injured the people of the North more by throttling the Government and tying it to the chain and ball of non-action than they ever hurt them by the very worst that was done by the allied forces of southern rebels and northern copperheads during the war. Look at the distress everywhere, where men and women must work or starve; and look at what has not been done by this Congress for the alleviation of that distress.

Far be it from me to attempt to divert attention from or belittle the importance of the efforts which have been directed toward the investigation of serious charges preferred against high officers of the Government and members and employés of this body. I am fully in accord with the spirit of that electric motto from the man of few words and mighty acts whose incumbency of the Presidency is a fitting sequel to his magnificent success in the field of war, "Let no guilty man escape." But should our eagerness in pursuit of guilt and dishonesty prevent us from laboriously and earnestly devising means to relieve the country from the troubles which beset our financial, commercial, agricultural, mining, and manufacturing interests? Shall the mines of Pennsylvania be permitted to fill with water? Shall the looms of Massachusetts remain idle, and—

> The rusting turbine stand
> Beside the empty flume?

Shall the ship-builders of Maine be compelled to let their horny palms grow soft? Shall idle plows rest in weed-grown furrows? Shall the sea-craft of New York rot in their docks and thousands of idle sailors be driven to ruin and desperation? Shall the machinists of Pittsburgh bemoan the coming famine and watch with saddened eye their idle engines and their dead, cold forges? Shall the steamboatmen of the West and South cease from the pursuit of their calling and be discouraged into indolence? Shall nothing be done to lift an unbearable load of debt from a people who are too proud to talk of repudiation, but too hampered by embarrassments to be able to make their willingness to work prove their solvency? Shall President-making and slate-smashing and the emergencies and schemes of the democratic party longer prevent the doing or the attempt at doing something which shall help to take these heart-breaking loads from the backs of the people?

But there are sins of commission as well as of omission, positive acts as well as negative ones, with which I shall take occasion to charge the representatives of the democratic party assembled on this floor. Let me examine the record of the past eight months.

Mr. Speaker, for more than fifteen years the democratic party, in consequence of its manifold acts of disloyalty to the Union, has been kept out of power. During all that time the people have not dared to and would not trust it with the control of either branch of Congress or the executive department of the Government. But the head and front of its offending—the late rebellion—being somewhat softened by lapse of time, the loud and long-continued asseveration of its leaders that they were as patriotic and as devoted to the Union as any in the land, has at length given them the control of this House; and what has been the result? I leave it to their acts to show whether their professed love and devotion to the Union had any foundation in fact.

At the opening of this session of Congress the House of Representatives employed as doorkeepers, messengers, folders, &c., a large number of men who had been disabled in fighting the battles of the Union, and the very first act of this party was to dismiss these crippled soldiers and supply their places with men who had served in the confederate ranks.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] offered a resolution on this floor in substance that the House should retain in its service as doorkeepers, messengers, &c., such Union soldiers as had lost a limb in their country's service. And when I saw the scores of these one-legged and one-armed soldiers of the Union hobbling out of the Capitol and moving down Pennsylvania avenue, and saw a confederate soldier who had stood guard at the dead-line at Andersonville and shot down without mercy the brave but emaciated and starving soldiers of the Republic—when I remember that all the democrats on this floor voted against the humane resolution retaining these patriot soldiers in their places, I felt as though all their professions of loyalty were hollow, empty pretenses.

But they call themselves reformers. Well, sir, if to change the well-established modes and forms of legislation which have always existed in the Government, and to make that change in a manner which has been declared by the great lights even of that party as revolutionary, then they are reformers; for in the Indian appropriation bill they inserted a provision to transfer that Bureau from the Interior to the War Department and reported a bill to reduce the Army from 25,000 to 10,000 men.

In the legislative appropriation bill they inserted a provision reducing the salaries of the heads of Departments and of the poor clerks employed by them, whose wages had been fixed by law by this very democratic party as long ago as 1854, when their pay would purchase far more of the necessaries of life than at the present time.

In the legislative and judicial appropriation bill they have repealed title 26 of the Revised Statutes in reference to the elective franchise, and have virtually repealed the eight-hour law, by increasing the number of hours of a day's work to ten.

And in the consular and diplomatic bill they have reduced the salaries of our ministers and consuls abroad, and I blush to say it, have made the ordinary legislation of the country the subject of a partisan caucus.

Heretofore, sir, the rules of the House have precluded the insertion of matters of general legislation in bills appropriating money to defray the expenses of the Government. A concise view of the situation on this subject may be found in a single paragraph of the report of the conference committee of the Senate:

> The committee of conference on the part of the Senate submit that as anything like a just and intelligent adjustment of the salaries of the employés, clerks, heads of Bureaus, chiefs of divisions and of the subdivisions of the Executive Departments, a service at once extended and diversified, must necessarily involve a critical and laborious examination into its details and duties, an undertaking quite impracticable in the last days of a session of Congress and unwise to attempt in connection with an appropriation bill, the committee therefore propose, as a concession, in order to meet the views of the House on the subject of appropriations for the salaries, that the Senate will recede from its amendments to the bill of the House in this respect, and remit the question of the revision and adjustment of the same to a joint select committee of four, two of whom shall be appointed by the presiding officer of each House, whose duty it shall be to revise and adjust the salaries, having due regard to a just public economy and the efficiency of the service, and make report of their doing therein on the first day of the next session of Congress: And provided, That any change made in said salaries by Congress upon said report shall take effect from the 1st day of July, 1876; and all persons who shall be affected thereby and who shall continue in the service shall be deemed to have accepted the terms hereof and acquiesced therein.
> But the Senate cannot, having regard to its constitutional rights and duties as a co-ordinate branch of the legislative department of the Government, assent to the changes in the existing law that it believes to be pernicious as the price of securing appropriations necessary to carry on the operations of the Government under the laws as they now exist. And upon the same principle the Senate does not demand that the House of Representatives shall vote to appropriate any money, even to meet the legal obligations of the United States, that the House may feel it to be its duty to refuse; thus leaving to each House absolute independence in respect of acceding or not acceding to new provisions of law that it believes to be unwise.

And the committee further submit that the Senate will recede from its amendments to the House amendments on the reduction of the civil list in the Executive Departments of clerks and employés, and agree to any amendments which shall reduce the number one-half that proposed by the bill of the House, observing in such reduction the exercise of such discrimination as to the needs of the service in the several subdivisions thereof as a careful examination of the same may indicate.

I have said that this method of legislation had been denounced as revolutionary by the leading men of that party, and I make a brief quotation from a speech delivered in the Senate in 1856 by Senator Hunter, of Virginia:

Now, sir, what I said was, when either House sought to make the appropriation bills the means of forcing on another a measure which was obnoxious to it, in either alternative it was revolution itself; that is to say, a change of constitution; for it forced the other House to yield its constitutional privileges in order to get the Government along. It would be revolutionary if they failed to be coerced in this way and stopped the wheels of the Government to compel them to do it; because it is their constitutional duty to carry on this Government and respect the constitutional privileges of the other branch. I know votes can be brought up in which I have voted for legislative measures on the appropriation bills. I have always believed that it was irregular, that it was improper; but I have never advocated the doctrine of voting for it in one House when known to be obnoxious to the other. But even in regard to the tariff amendment of last year, it will be found by referring to the debate that I admitted then that if it was obnoxious to either House the other had no right to insist; and consequently when the Senate out of abundant caution struck it out, against my vote I admit, but struck it out in reference to some such contingency as this, the House acceded to it, and admitted the propriety of doing so. I only urged it upon the ground that it was agreeable to the House, where it passed almost without reference to party. If it were agreeable to the Senate too, and agreeable to all sides, I should not say there was anything revolutionary or improper in the act. But what is revolutionary, and what is improper, in my estimation, is for one House to attempt to use appropriation bills to force on the other legislation which is obnoxious to it, to make it give up its will, its views of propriety, its feelings of what is right. The distinction is obvious. I have never said that the mere act of sending this provision here, if agreeable to us, would be revolutionary in itself; but I say that if, after we have shown our dissent to it, and declared that it is not agreeable to us, they should insist on it, and say we must either take it or they will stop the wheels of Government, the act would be revolutionary in itself, because it is saying to us that we must give up those privileges which belong to us.

We have a right to judge in regard to this measure; and if they say we shall not judge, but must adopt their opinions or they will stop the wheels of government, I ask if the propriety of such a proceeding can be vindicated? There is only one way in which it seems to me it may be vindicated, and that is that the measure itself is of so much importance that it is justifiable to commit an act of revolution in order to carry it.

And yet this House undertakes to force the Senate to adopt this obnoxious and revolutionary method of legislation under the implied, if not the expressed, threat that otherwise the wheels of government shall be stopped for want of money.

But these reformers are men who took the back pay in the Forty-second Congress. The chairman of the Appropriation Committee, who is now so clamorous for the reduction of salaries of members of this House and the poorly-paid laboring men of the Government, was a member of that Congress, who not only voted for and took his back pay, but here in his place declared, not three years ago, that the pay of members of Congress should not be less than $10,000 per annum; and the Speaker of this House, who was a member of the Thirty-ninth Congress, voted for and took the back pay and kept it.

These are the men to lead the reform movement in this presidential contest. It looks very much like "Satan rebuking sin."

They claim to be in favor of retrenchment. Let us examine this for a moment.

They have reduced the appropriations $25,000,000, and in what way? By refusing to appropriate money to complete the public buildings now in process of construction, by cutting down the appropriation for rivers and harbors, and by curtailing the mail facilities of the country.

The result of all this, sir, will not be retrenchment. The public works will suffer great waste and these reductions will have to be made up in the deficiencies at the next session of Congress. This sort of retrenchment does no posisble good. Its purpose is for political effect, and nobody will be deceived as to that. But they take it upon themselves to cry retrenchment, as though that word had never been heard in these Halls. Sir, the republican party have always been retrenching as much as was consistent with the public service. At the first session of the last Congress the appropriation bills were reduced $26,000,000; but the public works and public interests nowhere suffered.

And where, I ask, will their retrenchment lead us?

It was asserted by the republican speakers (myself among the number) during the last campaign that in case the democratic party should come into power the rebel soldiers would be pensioned, and it will be remembered with what force and vehemence the orators and newspapers of the democratic party denied this assertion. But before this House had been in session four weeks the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Hunton,] an ex-confederate general who commanded the rebel forces at Ball's Bluff, where the lamented Baker fell, reported a bill to repeal section 4716 of the Revised Statutes, which provides:

No money on account of pension shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person who in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aided or abetted the late rebellion against the authority of the United States

But notwithstanding the fact that they have cut down the appropriations $25,000,000, how much have they reduced taxation? Not one dollar. The burden of taxation rests as heavy upon the people as before, and they have neither offered nor sought any legislation to relieve them.

The Committee of Ways and Means has not reported a single bill of a general nature during the whole session. Why this masterly inactivity on the part of a leading committee charged with the duty of originating all bills in relation to the revenue? Why has not something been proposed to relieve the people? Or how shall we account for the failure of the Committee on Banking and Currency to propose some means to settle this question of finance? All that has been done so far is to make provisions to carry out a law passed at the last session for issuing silver coin in the place of fractional currency.

I can see nothing but failure on the part of the majority of this House to meet the demands of the people. The whole session has been frittered away in matters foreign to the legitimate business of legislation. A drag-net has been hauled hither and thither all over the country to keep thirty-five investigating committees in something to do. These committees have ransacked the cradle and the grave, opened the doors of the penitentiary and the insane asylum for witnesses; they have been in session day after day, week after week, and month after month, with closed doors, taking hearsay testimony; and what is the result of it all? Why, we have found that one officer of the Government, the late Secretary of War, has accepted some thousands of dollars as a present from a man who held a post-tradership; but we have not been shown where Belknap even misapplied or misappropriated one dollar of the public funds or made a single contract whereby the Government lost a single cent. Even his record is in the broadest contrast with that of the democratic party, which when last in power filched millions from the public Treasury, and, had such a thing been possible, would have stolen the country itself.

But, sir, I ask you to look further at the mode in which these investigations, as they are called, have been carried on. There has been exhibited an unscrupulous and wanton disregard of private rights and of the theory and principles upon which the Government is established. Private property and personal liberty have been invaded as though these, the dearest rights of American citizens, found no guarantee in the Constitution of the United States or the laws of the land, and as though the power of this House was absolute and supreme over all.

I submit it to the people whether they will indorse the action of the democratic party in its attempt to arrogate to itself the executive and judicial departments of the Government and make it purely legislative in form.

I commend the record in the case of Hallet Kilbourn to all law-loving and liberty-loving citizens, and especially to all the well-disposed and honest democrats of the country for examination and reflection. I would like to have them know that besides all the laws written and unwritten for the good and well-being of society there is still another which flings aside all idea of the right of private property and personal liberty, and that is the unexpressed and inscrutable will of this House. The law of violated majesty, borrowed from the jurisprudence of Tiberius, one of Rome's most cruel tyrants, and sought to be ingrafted upon the legislation of a free country—a law which snatches away the liberty and lives of the unoffending when they become hateful to tyrants, and which, if its use as exercised here in the unlawful imprisonment of an inoffensive citizen and a denial of the writ of habeas corpus shall be approved by the people of this country, will sooner or later fill this land with the sighs and groans of a nation of slaves.

On the subject of investigation I desire to note one fact, and that is the readiness shown by the republican party to have these investigations carried forward. No impediment has been put in the way; but on the other hand everything has been done that could be done to facilitate their progress,

In order to secure the conviction of the late Secretary of War the President took extraordinary means to bring the witness Marsh from the Dominion of Canada, whither he had fled to escape prosecution under the laws of the country and was safely lodged from the service of process. The Treasury, the Interior, the War and Navy, and in a word, the entire executive branch of the Government has been laid wide open to the scrutinizing gaze of these committees, and that too; when it was apparent to every one that they were acting without reasonable grounds to believe that frauds or abuses existed.

This willingness to be investigated does not find a precedent in the administration of the last democratic President, when it was charged that the collector of the port of Philadelphia had shown a most reckless disregard of the rights of the people of the State of Pennsylvania and had endangered and weakened our system of government by destroying all confidence and respect for those who administered the laws, and committed a series of acts amounting to felonies, subjecting him and his associates to prosecution and punishment in the Federal courts, and a committee of this House was appointed to inquire into the truth of those charges. Mr. Buchanan not only entered his solemn protest against the proceeding of this House in the appointment of the committee, but also proclaimed to the world that the whole power of the Executive would be exerted to protect those who might choose to disobey the summons of the Speaker of this House, or, having obeyed, might refuse to testify before its committee, instead of exercising that power to forward the investigation, as the present Administration has done.

But, sir, investigations have been instituted among the honorable members of this House. And I have to say, in no criminating spirit, but with feelings of great regret, that they have not been characterized by forbearance, impartiality, magnanimity, and justice which becomes the elevated, dignified character of an American Congress. When the honorable Speaker of the House was charged with having received money for a position in the Army, although the testimony appeared to be of the most direct and positive character, the committee having the matter in charge acted and reported promptly and with a unanimity that did credit to the generosity and manliness of all its members. But when the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HAYS] was accused of selling a cadetship, which accusation there is not one scintilla of proof to support, the committee retired and for more than five months have, for aught the House knows, slept and slept soundly on the subject. Of course the House is not aware of the cause, but it seems to me that it is pertinent at this time to inquire why this delay. The Speaker was acquitted on account of his previous good character and his long, valuable, and eminent services to the Republic. These considerations completely answered the positive statements of an unimpeached witness. Whether other members of this House have been less fortunate in securing a place in the public esteem I know not, nor is it necessary to inquire. It is sufficient to know that every member of this House is the peer of every other member, and that his character is worth something to his country, himself, and his family. And looking at the conduct of the majority of this House, it might not be too much to say that these investigations have been carried on for ulterior, unworthy purposes; but I do not say that; I leave that to the consciences of the committee having them in charge and of the majority of the House which approves them. And yet, to the judgment of the country, which will unequivocally condemn the spirit which has pervaded these investigations, the animus of which is "that if you are a democrat and guilty, the committee makes haste to report you innocent and the House to acquit; but if a republican and innocent, the committee makes the same haste to report you guilty and the House to convict you, or otherwise your character will be left to suffer under the curse of a groundless accusation." But I rejoice, sir, that in one instance at least this House has recognized that consummate virtue in American character which is above all pecuniary considerations.

I will not find fault, sir, at the expenditure of more than half a million of dollars in these investigations. I only leave the responsibility of this extraordinary expenditure to those who made it. There is where it belongs. But I accept the result with gratification and believe that as a member of the republican party I have reason to feel proud and rejoice in the assurance that these investigations have given us that the republican administration of to-day is the purest and best the country has had in the last fifty years.

But, sir, if the country is submitted to the kind of retrenchment proposed on this floor, what is to be its pecuniary condition? They propose in the manner already stated to reduce the appropriations $25,000,000, or if you take the jocose statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] at Saint Louis for it, $64,000,000. But, does any one think we shall have a balance in the Treasury, or if we consider the number of bills before this House providing for the payment of southern war claims can it be reasonably expected that we will have any money at all?

I beg leave to present a number of these bills for the payment of money to war claimants, amounting in the aggregate to $1,582,269, which I will append to my remarks.

Some years ago a direct tax of $5,153,886 was apportioned among the Southern States. Of this sum they paid $2,492,110, leaving $2,661,776 still unpaid. The Government has not pressed the payment of this balance, and now comes a proposition to refund that which has been paid.

It is proposed (H. R. No. 232) to pay $68,072,088 to the cotton-tax lobby under the specious pretense of refunding it to the men who produced the cotton and actually paid the tax.

But still further it is proposed (H. R. No. 2364) to compensate parties at the South for the use and occupation of all property by the United States during the war of the rebellion, which it is estimated, after careful consideration, would amount to the sum of $1,205,163,000.

And it is proposed yet further (H. R. No. 553) "to adjust and settle the claims of citizens of the United States for stores and supplies taken or furnished during the rebellion for the use of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes;" and a careful estimate of the sum which would have to be paid out of the public Treasury on this proposition indicates no less an amount than $1,205,163,000, aggregating the enormous sum of $2,482,642,133, a sum far exceeding the national debt, which we do not feel able at present to pay, and in comparison with which the proposed reduction is a meager sum indeed. And this is the sort of retrenchment they invite us to. On one hand they retain in the Treasury for a few months, to the prejudice of the public service, $25,000,000, while on the other they scatter broadcast among persons who were never under a suspicion of loyalty to the Government more than $2,000,000,000. And this they call retrenchment.

Can any sensible man believe in case this party shall be restored to power, with its present nominee for President, it will not allow and promise payment say of all these claims?

Mr. Speaker, in this brief, imperfect review I have sought to present some of the leading features of the record made by this branch of Congress under the guidance and promptings of a democratic majority. Are these, the first-fruits of democratic power, to be accepted as an earnest of what we may look for when a fuller restoration shall have come? Shall we accept these introductory acts as an indication of the policy and purposes which would characterize a complete return to power of that party which during the past memorable fifteen years has been the critic of republican action and a sympathizer with secession and rebellion?

Is it by such acts and omissions, such wastefulness in opportunity, such sham battles of retrenchment, and such burlesques of reform that the constitutional democracy expects to find favor and confidence in the eyes of the people of the United States? Have the effort and method and outcome, the inception and fruition of "investigation," brought about that condition of the public mind which finds assurance and relief in the election of a democratic President? Has the handling of our financial problems lulled the apprehensions which are somewhere said to exist in deprecation of a further continuance of "radical" rule? Has the work of democratic committees so fascinated public creditors and private claimants, maimed veterans and needy pensioners, unemployed mechanics and burdened tax-payers, that they are to be expected to urge the return to power of a party whose latest and most conspicuous achievement is to block the machinery of practical legislation and pervert this Capitol into a vast infirmary for the exercise of an experimental quackery in treating real and imaginary political disorders?

Can the people be expected to yearn for the decisive success of a party whose exigencies seem to demand that the machinery of this Government shall remain at a stand-still while statesmanship gives way to the purposes and pursuits of an all-pervading system of detective work? What has been done by the thirty-five standing and select committees of this House to illuminate and glorify the record of the democracy and crown that party with the bays of the victor and pronounce it the legitimate successor of the organization which has been in power during the past fifteen years?

Mr. Speaker, I am not of that school of politics which insists upon a denial of wrong-doing and a blindness to wrong-doers for party's sake. I am not in sympathy with that fashion of thinking which belittles the work and thought and result of political management; and I have no fellowship with those who are not pledged and bound to all measures of true reform and all acts compelling a full responsibilty for and a rigid account of all official performances done in the name of the people.

But, sir, I should confess myself to be but too easily misled by false pretenses and too readily played upon by weak devices and transparent designs if I were to admit the legitimacy of the inquisitions which have so lamentably interrupted the exercise of the paramount functions and perverted the true purpose of this branch of the Federal Legislature. I should be obnoxious to the charge of weakly accepting the counterfeit for the genuine if I were to admit that the political jugglings of the past eight months upon this floor were anything better than a series of blunders begotten of a misdirected zeal and prosecuted by an overeagerness to blind the eyes of the country to the sins of the democracy by magnifying the shortcomings of an occasional republican delinquent and placing in a false light the acts and utterances of leading, trusted members of the party of national fidelity.

I should be far too credulous and gullible for the duties of a member of this body if I were to confess myself a believer in the effectiveness or pure patriotism of purpose of the sorry and preposterous make-shifts which have followed one another in such quick succession here, and which have, by their very extravagance and barbarous profusion, brought themselves and their authors into ridicule. Investigation has been turned into a jest; and accusations, by the very frequency, flippancy, and improbability of their statement, have ceased to command serious attention. And who shall speak in seriousness of the sorry mockeries, weak vacillations, and poor pretenses done on the other side of this Chamber in the name of retrenchment and reform? It is a marvelous metamorphosis which presents us the democracy in the attitude of a reformatory agent. In the gasping spasms which produced the professions of a new departure we had something of the phenomena of a death-bed repentance, but the ejaculations and exhortations of "reform," when coming with an unnecessary vehemence and fierce clamor from democratic lips, make one wonder at the apparent extremities of a party whose nurses and attendants are loud in their declarations of its lusty vigor and fast-accumulating strength.

"Reform" sounds strangely upon lips which shout their owners hoarse with plaudits to Saint Tammany and whose last effective sachem is a fugitive from justice. "Reform" has a strangely hollow sound when uttered by leaders whose lives can only find their parallels in the panic-stricken mariners:

> They vow to mend their lives, but then they don't,
> Because if drowned they can't, if spared they won't.

Mr. Speaker, I hear the mustering of the White Leagues; I see the hideous disguises of the Ku-Klux Klans; my ears are shocked with the suppressed groans of the dying victims of massacres, which are cruelly misnamed "negro conspiracies," and the true story of which is curtly disposed of by the cry of "the bloody shirt." I see this Government suffering from such a sense of insecurity as it has not felt since the dreadful days of our civil war. I view with a feeling almost of dismay the incapacity of democratic hands to restore in any acceptable manner or comeliness of shape that which they would pull down and destroy. I see in the democratic mind a fast-waking dissolution of its dreams and preconceptions of its party's fitness and capacity to handle this mighty machine of government with efficacy and wisdom; and I see, in what has been so painfully evident here this session, the inadequacy of mere passion and political vehemence to deal with the material interests which, since the by-gone days when the democracy held the reins of power in this Government, have advanced with gigantic strides and been augmented as by a tenfold growth and multiplication of development.

It seems to me, indeed, sir, that the unwise acts and omissions, the mistakes and the unsatisfactory results of the efforts of the majority of this body cannot have been unheeded by the people, and cannot but have left the impression upon the popular mind that it is much too soon after the war of the rebellion to venture upon the experiment of replacing this Government in the hands of the democratic party. The party to which I am proud to declare a full allegiance is not perfect, not without faults or blemishes, but it has had the grand, educating experience and training of these days and years of growth and expanding power, and keeps closer to the advanced pickets of the army of empire and events than its halting, doubting, outpaced adversary; for it is the party of progress and the champion of a broader and more expansive civilization than can find a just appreciation among those in spite of whose efforts this country has reached its present magnitude and power.

Sir, it is my opinion that the American people have already determined that the democratic party shall, in the approaching political contest, again fail to regain the control of this Republic. The deliberations of the Cincinnati convention have resulted in the selection of candidates distinguished for their purity of life, unswerving patriotism, and admirable capacities, and into their hands the suffrages of the people will certainly intrust the destinies of the nation for the succeeding presidential term.

Mr. Speaker, I am but an obscure member of the grand and glorious party which has held power during a term of years and a succession of events, which, tremendous and fearful as they were in their advent and incidents, seem to have been necessary to the purification and salvation of the nation; but I am proud even of my small share of the glory of a party by whose efforts this Republic has been brought to see and celebrate, in becoming fashion, its centennial year. And in the year which begins a second century under the beneficent principles of the Declaration of Independence, I believe that I am one of a great uprising people upon whose heart of hearts are inscribed the words, "Nationality, Liberty, and Justice." I believe too fully in the intelligence, high endeavor, and loyalty of purpose of such a people to feel any apprehensions concerning the outcome of the contest which lies before us.

I believe that the result of the ballot of November next will be so decisive a verdict in favor of the justness and true conservatism of republican rule that even the inner and more honest heart of the wiser brethren of the democratic church will experience a sense of relief and security. I believe that this is the year in which the "lost cause" will be peacefully and decently buried among the illusions and fallacies of the agitated past; and that the few humbled and chastened democrats who may, under God's providence, be permitted to re-enter these Halls as members of a future Congress, will come here with contrition and humility of heart, and atone for the riotous caprices and crude blunderings of their infatuated predecessors.

The following are some of the more important claims which have been presented to this Congress that the ever loyal people of this country are asked to pay:

A Review of the Financial Condition of the Country—Results of Radical Misrule.

SPEECH OF HON. J. K. LUTTRELL,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 29, 1876,

On the financial and political condition of the country.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Mr. Speaker, we have arrived at the most important period in our national history. The people demand retrenchment and reform. They demand that we reduce the expenditures of Government; that we reduce taxation. Hundreds of thousands of the honest business men of our country are announcing their emancipation from party ties and enrolling themselves on the side of retrenchment and reform. This is the time when we, the servants of the people, should manifest the most earnest and determined spirit of reform.

Sir, as one of the representatives of the people, I demand that the true condition of the financial affairs of the Government be exhibited, that the tax-payers of the country may know who are responsible for the fraud, corruption, and profligacy that exist in every Department of the Government. The cry of party misrule, extravagance, corruption, and unjust taxation is sounded in every household in the land. Only the other day the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] informed this House that thousands of laboring-men were living on "garbage;" that men were demanding employment or bread.

Sir, who is responsible for this state of affairs? Every day we hear of some cause for complaint. Every day the report reaches us of some defalcation or embezzlement in the management of the financial affairs of the Government. We review the long list of defalcations, embezzlements, frauds, deceptions, corruption, and thieving on the part of Government officials until the hearts of honest men sink within them. Business is stagnated and depressed; our commerce is almost paralyzed; our sails no longer whiten the seas; our great ship-building interests are dead; the products, and even the mails of the country, are carried in foreign bottoms. The whole country feels the curse of party misrule. The workshops of the North are closed; the fields of the South uncultivated. Want stalks with hungry and deadly tread in our great cities. Thousands of working men and women are idle and in want of the bare necessities of life.

Who is responsible for all this? Who is responsible for the misrule, extravagance, fraud, and corruption that exist to-day? Who is responsible for the Black Friday job, that involved in bankruptcy and ruin tens of thousands of our business men? Who is responsible for the Sanborn-contract jobs that brought financial ruin to so many prosperous merchants of our country? Who is responsible for the Credit Mobilier and Contract and Finance-Company frauds, whereby millions have been taken from the people and the Government? Who is responsible for the Indian-ring steals, where the poor Indian and the Government are alike plundered of millions of dollars? Who is responsible for the straw-bid and postal-ring plundering of millions of the hard earnings of the people? Who is responsible for the increase of the civil list of officials or employés from 44,527 in 1860 and 47,375 in 1864, to 94,119 in 1875, and to 102,350 in 1876, at a cost of millions of dollars to the tax-payers of our country? Who is responsible for the system of espionage and oppression in the execution of the revenue laws, which robs the producer and enriches the official at the expense of the people's Treasury? Who is responsible for a system of taxation that crushes the productions of labor, enriches the importer, and maintains an army of cormorants in high places and official positions? Who is responsible for the spies and informers who infest every port of our country, who have desolated homes and dragged their inmates, cuffed, chained, and beaten, hundreds of miles on mere pretense or the accusation of such spies and informers who have been doing the bidding of the Administration for the past ten years? Who is responsible for the naval frauds and jobs, whereby the Government and the people have been plundered of millions of their hard earnings and our Navy placed under the control of political jobbing rings, while our brave and gallant naval officers are powerless to prevent this wholesale plunder? Who is responsible for the granting of hundreds of millions in bonds and money and nearly three hundred millions of acres of the public land to corporations, while hundreds of thousands of settlers and their wives and little ones have been robbed of their homes? Who is responsible for the oppression of the people by heartless railroad corporations and monopolies? Who is responsible for the establishment of hundreds of ports of entry where not a dollar of revenue is collected, although millions of the people's money is paid out to maintain officials for the same? Who is responsible for the fraudulent rings and jobs in the District of Columbia, whereby millions of dollars have been wrung from the people to enrich the ring thieves? Who is responsible for the state of desolation that prevails in South Carolina, Louisiana, and Mississippi? Who is responsible for the general misrule and frauds committed in the so-called reconstruction of the Southern States? Who is responsible for exempting the rich man's bonds from taxation while it taxes the poor man's salt and the widow's pension? Who is responsible for the increase of taxation? Who is responsible for the "crooked-whisky" jobs, by which the people have been defrauded of millions of dollars? Who is responsible for the dismissal from the Government service of the honest officials who attempted to prosecute and convict the thieves who have plundered the Government and the people? Who is responsible for the sale of post-traderships and robbing the soldier? Who is responsible for the introduction of hundreds of thousands of Chinese coolies to compete with free labor? Who is responsible for the frauds perpetrated in the Pension Department, where the maimed and disabled soldiers of our country have been robbed of their just rights? Who is responsible for the jobs and peculations in the grave-stone contracts, by which most of the $600,000 appropriated was pocketed by a set of plunderers? Who is responsible for all the corruption and robbery of the Government and the people by political officials during the past ten years? Who is responsible for the increase of the tariff from an average of 14 per cent. under democratic administrations to an average of fifty-odd per cent., thereby compelling the toiling millions to pay 50 per cent. of their hard earnings for the benefit of the manufacturers? Who is responsible for often-repeated and violated pledges to the people? And who is responsible for the defeat of the democratic work of economy and reduction of sixty-four millions during the present session of Congress? Sir, the official records speak out in thunder tones. The records show that the leaders of the republican party are responsible. They have had the entire control of all the departments of Government and are responsible, and at the door of that party alone the responsibility must be laid. That party must answer to the people. It must plead to this indictment, and we will rest our case before the people upon the official record made by the republican party.

Sir, there is an uprising of the toiling millions from ocean to ocean, from the lakes to the Gulf, from center to circumference, demanding retrenchment and reform; demanding that a change in the administration be made. The mighty hosts are now arrayed for battle, to make the great fight for honest government. Upon their banners is inscribed the motto of every honest business, tax-paying, laboring-man in the land—retrenchment and reform!

Now for the record to sustain the indictment.

At the commencement of our national existence as a Republic our debt and expenditure were less than $1 per capita. And so it remained for more than a quarter of a century. As property increased in value, and in just accordance with the wealth of the individual, the per capita amount of debt and expenditure increased, until 1861 the tax had reached the sum of $2 per capita. Hence there was no general complaint of the burdens of Government, and no suspicion of dishonesty and misrule as of the present day.

I will now call your attention to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that you may see the amount of the receipts and expenditures of the Government from March 4, 1789, until June 30, 1875. By permission of my friend from North Carolina [Mr. DAVIS] I use a table prepared for him by the Treasury Department. I have compared the table with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury and find it correct in every particular:

EXTRAVAGANCE OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

Economy and simplicity should characterize a republican government, and honesty and fidelity should mark the character of its public servants. In the earlier days of the Republic this was the case. From the 4th day of March, 1789, the day the Federal Constitution went into operation, down to June 30, 1875, the entire net ordinary receipts of the Government, exclusive of loans, amounted to $4,337,043,618.27. Of this sum only $1,841,953,353.62 were collected from the foundation of the Government down to 1861, and $4,495,081,264.63 have been collected since that time. More than twice as much money has been collected from the people in fourteen years of republican rule than was collected in more than seventy years prior to their advent to power. Now let us see how about the expenses for the same period of time. From March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1875, the net ordinary expenses of the Government—as any one may see by adding the figures under the head of "net ordinary expenses," on pages 65 to 67 of the official report of the Register of the Treasury, made November 4, 1875—amounted to $6,801,956,954.69. I have caused a table to be made, grouping these expenditures so as to show the amounts expended each four years of the successive administrations of the Government. Here it is:

Civil list and net ordinary expenditures of the United States Government, by periods of four years, from the organization of the Government.—(Condensed from the report of the Register of the Treasury for 1875.)

† Total in six years of Grant's two terms $1,021,813,950.91.

From March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1861, the entire net ordinary expenses of the Government amounted to $1,581,706,195.34 From June 30, 1861, to June 30, 1875, fourteen years of republican rule, the net ordinary expenses amounted to $5,220,250,759.35; and this is exclusive of the public or war debt; that is, fourteen years of republican rule cost the Government more than three times as much money as the whole cost of the Government from 1789 to 1861, a period of seventy-two years. But it may well be said that the ordinary expenses of the Government during the war were necessarily increased. That is true, and to make the comparison fair let ns take a period of ten years since the war; and I wish it to be borne in mind that I am now speaking of the "net ordinary expenses" of the Government, exclusive of the interest paid on the public debt, which amounted to over $1,000,000,000, and the sums paid on the public debt itself, which amounted to many hundred millions more. From March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1861, the expenses of the Government—embracing a period of more than seventy-two years, covering the war of 1812, the Indian wars, and the Mexican war, and the purchase of Louisiana, the great Northwestern Territory, Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California—amounted, as I have already shown, to only $1,581,706,195.34. The net ordinary expenses of the four years of Johnson's administration was $1,012,420,202.14; six years of President Grant, $1,021,813,950; making in ten years of peace the enormous sum of $2,034,233,412.14, being nearly one-third more than all the expenses of the Government for seventy-two years, from 1789 to 1861, including the war of 1812, the Indian and Mexican wars; and if you add to the ordinary expenses of the six years of President Grant's administration the amount of principal and interest paid on the public debt, it will amount to $4,008,438,461.82; that is, more than two and a half times as much as the entire expenses of the Government from March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1861. I have here the table showing the total expenditures under the administration of President Grant for six years, from June 30, 1869, to June 30, 1875, as will be seen from the official report of the Register of the Treasury, page 67 of the pamphlet report:

FRAUDS.

But this is not the worst. I have shown from the official report that the net ordinary revenue collected by the Government, and which went into the Treasury since 1861, amounted to $4,495,081,264.63.

Is this not a fearful array of figures and facts? I appeal to all candid-thinking tax-payers of the country. I would ask them to ponder well before they continue a party in power whose official record is steeped so deep in profligacy. Is there a business man in the land who would retain a clerk or business agent for a moment whose record and acts showed a similar profligacy and mismanagement? I think not. Nor do I believe that the intelligent tax-paying voter is willing to continue in power a party that has abused and betrayed the responsible trust reposed in it by the people.

Footing up the figures we find that the Federal, State, county, and municipal tax for 1860 amounted to $4.94 per capita; and for 1870, counting interest on public debt, $15, or over three times as much; and in 1874, about $18 per capita, increasing day by day; and to-day it has reached nearly the sum of $22.50 per capita. And yet the leaders of the republican party inform the people that they are going to retrench and reform. Well, this is nothing new to the people. The Administration party gives us this stereotyped and oft-broken promise every year, but just as often fails to redeem its pledge. Talk about reform in the republican or Administration party by republican officials! It is mere talk. They have promised time and again to repent of their sins and reform, but "patience ceases longer to be a virtue." The people will no longer receive their confessions, but will set them aside, and re-instate in power a party who during seventy-two years of prosperous rule economized in every Department of the Government and protected the rights of the people with equal justice to all.

I now call your attention to a table giving the expenditures of the Navy, War, and Indian Departments:

Year.	Navy.	War.	Indian.	Total.
1800	$3,448,716 00	$2,560,878 00	.....	$6,009,599 00

In ten years, from 1865 to 1874, the expenditures of the Navy Department have increased nearly 50 per cent., yet we have no Navy. But a few months ago when we had some trouble with the Spanish government in the Cuban waters, the Secretary of the Navy called upon Congress for $5,000,000 additional appropriation to the thirty-odd millions appropriated for the Navy, (aggregating some $38,000,000,) to fit out vessels for the Cuban expedition. It was charged on this floor by my friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] and not denied by the republican members nor by the Secretary of the Navy, that, although we had expended over thirty millions of dollars the previous year for the Navy, we then had not one vessel fit to defend the harbor of the city of New York. What becomes of the vast sum expended each year for the maintenance of our Navy? Sir, it is expended for political purposes. Look at the testimony taken by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and you will see that millions go into the pockets of rings and jobbers.

I propose to append a few tables to show you how the money is expended.

The United States steamer Lackawanna was built in 1862 at a cost of $452,069 for material, labor, engines, and everything necessary to complete and fit her for sea. She was hauled on the dry-dock at Mare Island for repairs during the elections of 1869, 1871, and 1872, and the cost of these repairs by the political "ring" is $582,012.17, or $130,943.07 more than it cost to build her in 1862, when labor and material were much higher than in 1869 and 1872.

Cost of building in 1862, $451,069, (material, labor, and engines complete.)

This was at a time when men were forced to walk in line and vote what was known as the "tape-worm ticket."

I will here notice another specimen of naval-ring jobbery. The United States steamer Kearsarge was built at Portsmouth navy-yard during the late war at a cost of $182,000. During the elections of 1871, 1872, and 1873, this vessel was placed on the dry-dock at Mare Island for "repairs," for which the ring received $496,122.56. Now add the cost of equipment, sails, &c., engines, ordnance, &c., which will increase that sum $120,000, making a grand total of $616,122; so that the excess of the "repairs" over the original cost of this vessel amounts to $423,204. This enormous sum was used for the purpose of furnishing employment to hundreds of voters from "Barbary Coast," (the Five Points of San Francisco,) who were shipped to Mare Island for political purposes, to the exclusion of the honest mechanics of Vallejo and Mare Island, who refused to do the bidding of the ring. I here append a table furnished from the books:

Cost of repairing United States steamer Kearsarge, at the Mare Island navy-yard, commenced July, 1871, and completed January, 1874.

Honest mechanics were discharged and their places filled by political scalawags, having no knowledge of ship-building, although paid the highest wages. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been expended on the navy-yard in my district (Mare Island) for the benefit of political rings.

The Navy Department has expended since the war $260,000,000. Of this sum $86,000,000 has been used for the pay of officers, crew, provisions, and clothing, for the support of the Naval Academy, Marine Corps, hospitals, and naval asylums; the balance, $174,000,000, has been ostensibly expended for the maintenance of our Navy and improvements in the navy-yards. Sir, frauds are perpetrated and jobs put up by the political "ring" to such an extent that the people are annually plundered and defrauded of millions of dollars. The ring ships a cargo of coal to Mare Island, accompanied with instructions to the commandant to receive and receipt for it (ship measurement) at $17 per ton. He refuses, as he has an oversupply and the price demanded is considered exorbitant. The next day the ring procures an order from the Department directing the commandant to receive the coal at ship measurement and receipt for it at $22.50 per ton. Fifty thousand dollars' worth of stone is delivered at Mare Island for the dry-dock. The stone is inferior, not cut as required by the specifications. Rear-Admiral Rodgers and Captain Phelps, of the Navy, condemn it. An order comes from the Department to receive it. They report to the Department that the stone is totally unfit for use. Peremptory orders are returned to receive the stone, and they are compelled to obey the orders of their superior officers; and the result is that the stone is piled up in the yard, worthless for any purpose whatever. A new contract is immediately entered into for other stone. Ship-loads of oak timber are shipped to Mare Island and piled up and exposed to the weather to rot, the Department paying nearly 50 per cent. in excess of the market price for the same. The ring sells iron to the Government for the use of the yard at eight to twelve cents per pound, while the same quality of iron can be purchased in the San Francisco market for from four to six cents per pound. And so it is with everything else purchased for the use of the yard. A politician by the name of Pinney was forced on the yard as paymaster's clerk. Paymaster Doran refused to take him, and left the yard rather than be forced to employ him. The result was the stealing of over $1,000,000 from the Government and the people; and the political pet and favorite Pinney is now enjoying himself traveling in foreign climes. The Administration and leaders are careful to allow the culprit to escape to save themselves from conviction as accessaries.

Another political clerk, Cushing, was detected in making false entries in the time-books, thereby collecting and pocketing a large amount of money. Being a useful politician or instrument in the hands of the "ring," he was admonished to cover his tracks, and was severely punished by receiving a fat office or appointment in the Oakland post-office. Mr. Speaker, I might dwell for hours upon the abuses in the Navy, but time will not permit; but before leaving the subject I wish to say that the commanding officer at Mare Island, Rear-Admiral John Rodgers and Captains Phelps and Shirley and their subordinates are as noble, brave, gallant, and patriotic officers as ever wore the blue. They are utterly powerless to prevent the wrongs that have been and are being perpetrated by the ring. They are not even permitted to designate their private clerks or secretaries, but the ring selects and causes to be appointed all the clerks, as it did in the case of Pinney.

RUIN AND BANKRUPTCY THE RESULT OF RADICAL MISRULE AND PROFLIGACY.

I have charged that through the misrule and bad legislation of the republican party ruin and bankruptcy has visited many a household during the past few years. Wherein append an official table showing the result of Black Friday jobs, Credit Mobilier frauds, and Sanborn-contract steals, that have brought ruin to many homes and crushed the prospects, hopes, and energies of thousands of generous and noble hearts.

The following table will show more clearly the comparative results:

Year.	Failures in New York City.		Balance of United States.		Total.
	No.	Liabilities.	No.	Liabilities.	No.	Liabilities.
1870	430	$20,573,000	3,121	$67,669,000	3,551	$88,242,000

1873	644	92,635,000	4,539	135,864,000	5,183	228,499,000

From the above it will be seen that there were more failures by eleven hundred in 1873 than in 1872, with an increase in liabilities of $107,443,000. Of this increase in liabilities New York City is chargeable with $71,000,000.

In 1875, and including the six months ending June 30, 1876, there were eighty-one hundred and sixty-three failures, aggregating $186,257,695. Of this number and sum the last six months the report shows forty-six hundred failures, amounting to $108,415,429, with a corresponding increase for the month of July.

Under the mischievous legislation and misrule of the Administration but a few days, nay, a few hours, as in the case of the Black Friday job, were sufficient to put everything in disorder; to overthrow the plans and schemes of thousands of business firms, to cause a practical suspension of the monetary facilities of the entire country, and to totally destroy that confidence, without which in our day, trade and commerce is impracticable and cannot prosper.

The failures of 1873 and 1874 were more numerous than ever before known in any two years in the history of our country. It is equally true that there were some failures which for their prominence attracted universal attention, and that the liabilities of these few were more excessive than were ever before revealed in calamities of a like character in this country, and with rare exceptions in any other.

This is the language of the report. We find prospects no better in 1876. Four thousand six hundred failures during the first six months, nearly five thousand business firms of the country forced to close their doors within the first six months of the centennial year. What are we to expect? What can we expect if a party is continued in power that has totally disregarded its pledges for reduction of expenditures of Government, and that heeds not the demands of the people for economy and reform? Can such a party be longer trusted? Shall we confide another four years to the keeping of these sham reformers the destinies of 40,000,000 of people, or shall we demand a change and place the great reform governor of New York at the helm? The people demand a reduction in the expenditures of the Government and a reduction of taxation. Let us then try a change.

The report further states that—

There are throughout the country a large number of traders and merchants who cannot pay at maturity. There are many who are taking advantage of the times to force compromises upon their creditors, and the failures in the current quarter are likely enough to be numerous. (See pages 28¾ and 28¾.)

Reports come to-day that between two and three millions of spindles are standing still. Hundreds of other manufacturing establishments are standing idle. In the city of Philadelphia alone there are nearly one hundred thousand people idle, without employment. Similar reports come from all the great cities of the country. Mechanics and laborers are idle, southern fields and plantations uncultivated; no longer a market in the South for northern productions. A few years ago Pennsylvania found a good market in the South for her iron and coal; the farmers of the West a market for their wheat, flour, bacon, &c.; the Northeast a market for their mechanical and manufacturing productions; but by the misrule and bitter partisanship of the republican leaders the South is impoverished, business is stagnate, and the manufacturers of the North and East, the iron-dealers of Pennsylvania, and the farmers of the West no longer find a market in the South that was once so prosperous under democratic rule, and would be again but for the fiery appeals of politicians, who would fan the flames of passion and would have the business men of the North believe that the war was still raging in the South. Sir, we want peace and prosperity, that we may once more have a market in the South.

This is a sad comment, a sad prospect for the business men of the country in the centennial year. The prospects can only brighten, the clouds of financial gloom can only be dispelled by an uprising of the people in favor of retrenchment and reform.

The good news comes from all parts of the country, from every vale and hamlet, that the people are responding with hearty goodwill to the demands for retrenchment and reform. The great statesmen of the country—the Adamses, the gallant Sigel, Trumbull, Doolittle, Dana, &c.—are enrolling themselves on the side of reform and doing service for the people and good government.

Our merchants and business men have been harassed by spies and informers. Never since the foundation of our Government have we heard of spies in time of peace until the republican party assumed control of the Government; and now when peace reigns supreme throughout the land, we find almost every business house under the surveillance of a spy or informer. Last year the Government paid millions of dollars to spies and informers.

The following is a table from the official reports of the Government showing the amounts paid in New York and Boston alone. Had I time I would like to refer to the amounts paid elsewhere to spies, but my time will not permit.

Table showing in detail the amounts paid to spies and informers, collectors, naval officers, and surveyors of the port of New York.

The share under the moiety Sanborn-contract frauds paid to collectors:
To Hiram Barney	$64,607 29
To Simeon Draper	55,014 55
To Preston King	33,166 94
To Henry A. Smythe, in two years	102,710 13
To M. H. Grinnell, in one year	41,304 60
To Thomas Murphy	55,907 54
To Chester A. Arthur	56,120 21
Total amount of collectors' share of spoils	408,921 26

The naval officers' share of the spoils, $408,921.26; the surveyors' share of the spoils, $408,921.26; the share paid to spies and informers, $1,226,763.98; making a grand total paid to the spies and informers, collectors, naval officers, and surveyors (over and above their salries) of the enormous sum of $2,453,527.56 in the city of New York alone.

Paid to spies, informers, collectors, naval officers, and surveyors of the city of Boston, $654,162.48; making a grand total of $3,107,690.04 thus paid in the cities of New York and Boston.

The reports show that it costs $6.87 in New York City and $14.98 in Boston for each dollar of duty collected. (See statement of Senator DAWES in his speech delivered May 19, 1874, in the House of Representatives.)

This is a sad comment on the result of a republican form of government. I ask members of this House, I appeal to the people throughout the length and breadth of our country to show me when and where a democratic administration ever forced upon the business and tax-paying people of our country a system of spies—a system only fit for decaying monarchies and not for a free government; and yet we are, by a republican administration, forced to submit to it, and to pay for it too at an outlay of millions of dollars annually. Let the people arise in all their majesty and redeem the Government from financial ruin and degradation.

The great battle is coming. Merchants, farmers, mechanics, laboring-men, one and all, of every class, rise up; shake off this lethargy, demand and assert your rights at the ballot-box in November next for a complete change of administration.

The republican party have made many pledges to the people of retrenchment and reform. What pledge have they ever redeemed? Not one. The expenditures of Government have increased each year since the close of the war, and when the democratic members of the lower House of Congress respond to the demands of the people by cutting down the expenditures for this year $34,000,000, a sum greater than required previous to the war for the entire expenditure of the Administration, the republican members on this floor and at the other end of the Capitol rally in solid phalanx against reduction; and here we have been for weeks making the people's fight for retrenchment, reduction, and reform. And if thwarted and defeated, the responsibility must rest upon the republican party.

The republican party have had control of every department of the Government since the close of the war. What measure have they passed that had for its object the welfare, interest, and prosperity of the country? Can any member of that party on this floor point to one measure or act passed for the benefit of the great masses of the laboring men and women of our country? I pause for a reply. The official record shows not one. Look into the statute-books. There you will read acts giving and granting to corporations hundreds of millions of dollars in bonds and a like sum in money; your hard earnings. There you will find several acts granting to these same soulless corporations nearly three hundred million acres of land, a territory double in extent that of the original thirteen colonies. To-day these gigantic land monopolies count their lands—given to them by the republican party—not by acres, but by square miles, far surpassing in extent anything the world has ever before known. And still this party, that has bartered and given away the people's money, bonds, and lands, again comes before us and asks another four years' lease of power, appealing to the people, too, whom they have betrayed and so shamefully misrepresented. If indorsed again, will they not feel encouraged to become still more reckless in squandering the money of the people and the public domain? And will they not quote it as a ratification of their nefarious acts?

Let us see what the republican party has done in the way of subsidizing corporations and monopolies by granting lands and money toward enriching a few at the expense of the many. (See the reports of the Statistical Bureau of the Treasury Department.)

The grants of land to the Pacific railroads alone, according to a statement of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, amounted to 124,000,000 acres on July 1, 1869. Subsequent grants, especially the additional grant to the North Pacific Railroad Company, will increase it to 140,000,000 acres. But a million acres is so easily said that these figures convey no adequate idea of their meaning. We shall comprehend them better by the aid of a comparison. A glance at the atlas shows that the area of France is 213,214 square miles, which, being reduced to acres, gives us 136,474,240 acres. Instead, then, of saying that the donations by the republican Congress to the Pacific railroads amount to near 140,000,000 acres, we may say that they amount to an area greater than that of France. Now, France has a population about equal to that of the United States. It appears, therefore, that if peopled as densely as France the territory given to these Pacific railroads would accommodate the entire population of the United States. If peopled as densely as England and Wales, the same area would accommodate over 1,000,000,000 inhabitants. The total donations to all railroads now amount to over 200,000,000 acres, and the aggregate amount of land held by other classes of corporations and monopolists cannot be less than another 100,000,000 acres; making a grand total of nearly three hundred million acres of the people's domain given by the republican party to land-speculating railroad corporations and monopolies, an area greater by 20,000,000 acres than the united areas of France, Italy, and the United Kingdom, which support an aggregate population of nearly one hundred millions of inhabitants, and nearly three times the population of the United States.

It is with reference to the well-being of such a population of future occupants that our land policy should be shaped. Any policy which loses sight of this fundamental object lacks the very first element of republican statesmanship. To adopt a different policy is to countermand God's edict, "Increase and multiply and replenish the earth," or else it is to inflict upon those who shall fulfill it the penalty of a perpetual tribute to the land monopolists and aristocrats. It is to give corporations a mortgage upon the life-long earnings of unborn millions, not through one generation alone, but through successive generations for all time to come. It is to steal the birthright of whole generations of men and women and condemn them in advance to come into the world under the monstrous necessity of bargaining with a privileged class, made so by the republican party, for the right to share with them the surface of the planet which the Creator has given as the common heritage of the human race. It is to plant with one hand the acorn whence shall grow the deep-rooted oak of aristocracy, and with the other scatter wide the seeds of pauperism and debasement. It is to destroy culture and the delights of the intellect to the masses, in order that a few monopolists may revel in useless luxuries and unwholesome indolence. It is to stunt the development of mind itself, and cheat civilization of its best elements of progress. It is to assassinate civil liberty. It is to commit a crime against humanity, at which the very streams and mountains and primeval forests of the New World might cry out in mighty reprobation.

And the people will hold the republican party responsible for the wholesale plunder of the public domain, and the giving the same to corporations and monopolies.

The republican party has given to monopolies a tract of land greater in extent than that of France and the German empire; double the extent of the original thirteen colonies. Talk of the landlords of Europe, of landlords of England and Ireland, with their down-trodden and oppressed tenants; of Russian lords and their serfs. Mr. Speaker, the misery of the European tenant is but as the gentle shower of spring compared to the terrible wintry storm of oppression which will deluge the working men and women of our country if the republican party is continued in power. The republican party has granted in money, bonds, and lands of the people to corporations a sum nearly equal to the cost and expenditures of our Government during seventy-two years under democratic administrations. Are not these startling and shameful facts; facts, too, that should arouse the working-men of our country to a sense of the impending danger that awaits them and their posterity? The republican party is responsible for all this. They had the entire control of the Government at the time when all these wrongs were perpetrated; and the republican members of this House and the Senate are to-day as one man making a solid fight against reducing the expenses of Government. I would that the laboring and business men of the country were here that they could see with what pertinacity and obstinacy the republican members fight our efforts at reduction and reform. Thank Heaven we have one consolation, namely, if the people cannot be here to see it they will read it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

INDIAN RING FRAUDS.

In 1860, when we had a larger number of Indians than we have to-day, the cost of maintaining them was but a little over $2,000,000. In 1873 the cost of the Indian Department was a little over $3,000,000, while in 1875 it cost over $8,000,000, with a deficiency of nearly $600,000; and yet the evidence shows that not over 20 per cent. ever reaches the Indian. The balance goes to enrich the "ring." The Indians, being plundered, become dissatisfied, go to war, murder our frontiersmen and their families; add the expense of the war, and it foots up annually to many millions of dollars. The Indians are defrauded by rascally agents and "rings," as the following extracts of testimony will show. Chief Fast Bear says in his testimony before the commission:

> The beef-cattle that the Great Father has issued to me no doubt each steer has been weighed twice and called two; and some of them have been put away somewhere else, and I wish the Great Father would track them up.

Here is the testimony of Blackfoot to the commission:

> We sell our lands and what do we get for it? We get a pair of stockings, and when we put them on they go to pieces. They get some old shirts and have them washed and give them to us; we put them on and our elbows go right through them. They send us tin kettles. We go to get water to carry to our lodges, we dip the water up, but it all runs out again. That is what we get for our land. The President and Congress sends money to us, but we don't get a cent of it. We do not know where the money goes. Every agent gets rich that comes here.

This is the character of testimony that comes to us from those who have investigated this matter. "The agents get rich."

Mr. Speaker, this is so. Although they receive but $1,500 per annum in greenbacks, they get rich. I have never known within the last ten years but two agents that did not get rich, and those entered the Indian service poor and left it poor. The Indians were well cared for; everybody, both Indian and white, were satisfied but the "ring." There was no show for plunder; consequently there was much dissatisfaction with ring-jobbers, and Judge E. Steele, the agent and superintendent, was removed. The names of Steele and Fuller, agents in California and Montana, are loved and respected by the people and the Indians, but despised by the "rings." And why? Because they discharged their duty faithfully to the Government and the Indian and prevented the plundering of the appropriations by the "ring thieves." The testimony in another case shows that five thousand pairs of garters were sent to one reservation for the Indian women, although there was not a pair of stockings on the reservation. There must have been comfort as well as pleasure for the young Indian maidens to appear at the war-dance dressed in a pair of red garters, encircling the limb or place where the stocking ought to be. The democratic members of this House passed the bill transferring the management of the Indians to the War Department. General Sheridan and other Army officers testified that it would be a saving of over $10,000,000 annually to the Government. But the republican Senate defeated the bill. So much again for the boasted and often-made promises of economy by the republican party.

THE HIGH PROTECTIVE TARIFF AND ITS BURDENS OF TAXATION TO THE LABORING MEN AND WOMEN OF OUR COUNTRY.

Of the 40,000,000 people in the United States, not over 30,000 are engaged in manufacturing; consequently nearly 40,000,000 laboring men and women are compelled by enactment of the republican party to pay tribute at the rate of 50 to 80 per cent. to uphold and mantain twenty-five or thirty thousand manufacturers. There are about 8,000,000 persons over ten years of age engaged in farming in the United States. They are taxed on an average from 47 to 90 per cent. on all they buy, and very heavily on what they sell, for the upholding and encouragement of the 30,000 manufacturers in the country. The farmer pays this average percentage on his tools, his fencing, his household utensils, on nearly everything he buys. He pays a dollar for dry-goods, fifty cents of which goes to uphold the republican tariff and enrich the 30,000 manufacturers. He is compelled to sell at Liverpool prices, less the cost of transportation. That cost is increased in a thousand ways by the taxes on iron, steel, and by the other duties which will swell the cost of railroads and their management. He is taxed, therefore, on what he buys and what he sells. The farming army of 8,000,000 men are systematically bled at the rate of 50 per cent. for the benefit of the 30,000 republican, pampered, kid-gloved, aristocratic manufacturers. Of the thousands of articles used by the farmers and of the hundreds of articles mentioned in the tariff act, in no instance have I been able to find one exemption in favor of the farmer. No, Mr. Speaker, the farmer is at the mercy of speculators; he must bear the burdens of high tariffs and taxation.

The tariff under whig and democratic administrations averaged but from 14 to 22 per cent., while the republican tariff of 1875 averages from 50 to 180 per cent., the highest ever known in the history of any civilized country. This enormous tax was imposed and forced upon the people against the earnest protest of 8,000,000 farmers, hundreds of thousands of laboring-men, and the democratic members of both Houses of Congress. This unjust law was forced through Congress by the republican party, thereby enriching the few at the expense of the many; enriching 30,000 manufacturers at the expense of 40,000,000 people; thereby compelling the laboring poor to pay tribute to the rich. Is this in keeping with the pledges made by the republican party? No, Mr. Speaker, it is in direct violation of the solemn pledges made by the republican party to the people.

I will call your attention to the tariff or duty on a few of the leading articles used by the laboring classes. On printed calico we pay a duty of 71 per cent., on blankets we pay 78, and yet the duty on wool has been reduced, thereby aiding the importer and manufacturers who import Australian wool, while it impoverishes the wool-growers of our own country. On woolen cloth we pay 68 per cent.; on spool-thread, 74; woolen shirts and drawers, 91.

I have appended a table showing the duty paid on many other of the leading articles, as fixed by the tariff enacted by the republican party in 1875:

	Per cent.
Chloroform	150
Collodion	100
Magnesia, carbonate	63
Soda, acetate	68
Printed calico	51 to 71

Flannels	67 to 91
Woolen hosiery	51 to 79
Woolen manufactures	77 to 91
Woolen shirts and drawers	56 to 91
Banting	177
Woolen cloth	68
Woolen hats	88 to 97
Woolen rag	80 to 102

Let the laboring-men of our country read and reflect before they cast a vote to continue a party in power whose whole course of action and legislation has been to enrich a few aristocratic manufacturers, while it impoverishes millions of the laboring poor of the country.

The republican party is alone responsible for this infamous tariff. It alone is responsible for the internal-revenue tax that impoverishes the producer by overloading and crushing our productions with internal-revenue taxes, creating an army of officials in the land to collect these taxes, all of which must be paid for by the people.

The farmer has an oversupply of fruit. If he distils it he is compelled to pay an internal-revenue tax as soon as the fruit is distilled, a tax that amounts to more than the spirits are worth, as the spirits are not marketable under two or three years, while the republican-favored importer imports the productions of a foreign country and the goods lie in warehouse two years or until the market price is satisfactory before the wealthy importer is required to pay duty. Thus by enactment the republican party has discriminated against the producers and toiling millions of farmers and vine-culturists of our country, and in favor of the importer and for the actual benefit of foreign producers.

In my State (California) we have nearly $40,000,000 invested in fruit-growing and vine-culture. The action of the republican party has been to crush out our interests and favor the productions of foreign countries, and yet the republican party informs the country that it is the party of reform and equal justice to all, the laboring-man's friend, &c. Give us a tariff for revenue only. Under the present law the laboring man or woman goes to the merchant to purchase one dollar's worth of dry goods; 56 to 71 per cent. goes to uphold the manufacturer. The farmer goes to market to purchase a lot of wire or round iron; 58 or 71 per cent. of the amount he pays goes to the manufacturer. The wife buys some spool-thread; 71 per cent. goes to build up one of the 30,000 manufacturers. She wants a few sewing-machine needles; she must pay 46 per cent. She wants a sewing-machine; the merchant says it is worth from $65 to $105. "But," says the good wife, "how comes this? I see by the official reports that it only costs from $6 to $14 each to manufacture these machines, and they are shipped to Europe and sold for $23 each. Why should I pay three or four or five times as much for an American sewing-machine as the English, Irish, or French lady pays after it is shipped to Europe?" The answer is that the republican party have legislated to benefit the manufacturer that they may bleed the poor. The miner desires to purchase a suit of flannel or pair of blankets. He pays a duty of 91 per cent. So much for republican rule. This is a specimen of the fruit of the republican tree. It has proved very bitter fruit for the people, and very dear, too.

Leaving the question of tariff, I will now call your attention to another fruitful source of corruption practiced by the republican party during the past few years. Under the pretense of collecting revenue and enforcing the infamous tariff, hundreds of custom-houses and ports of entry have been established, not only along the sea-coast but all over our country. From Maine to Alaska, in every nook and corner along the coast, and on little streams where a Mississippi catfish would find it difficult to ascend. And when no other point along our sea-coast or bays could be found, ports of entry have been established away up in the interior; up in the Blue Ridge country; up toward the Rocky Mountains; by the snow-clad Sierras; far from ocean, lake, or river. These ports of entry or asylums for politicians number thousands, at hundreds of which not a cent of revenue is collected, although it costs the tax-payers millions of dollars to maintain them.

I now call your attention to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1873, from the following extract of which it will be seen what it costs to support these ports of entry and custom-houses.

I wish to call attention to a statement showing the rates of customs duties at various ports during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, and the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, together with the cost of collecting the same.

If time would permit, hundreds of instances could be cited in the reports where not a dollar is collected, and yet the expense of keeping up these ports is enormous. But, with the reports before them, the republican party has still continued to maintain and keep up these dens of political pauperism, while the laboring people of the country are struggling day by day to pay the expenses. I find here in the reports of Mr. Secretary Bristow and his Register hundreds of ports where we are paying thousands upon thousands of dollars and not one cent of revenue is collected. For instance: At Frenchman's Bay, in the State of Maine, in 1873 we collected $36.45 and paid $6,783 for collecting it; in 1875 we collected $4.40 and paid $6,124 for its collection. At Saint Augustine, Florida, not a dollar was collected, yet the republican party paid its officials $6,741.03. By reference to the tables it will be observed that at many other ports not a cent has been collected for years, although we pay large sums each year at these ports. At Paso del Norte, Texas, were collected $13.29 and paid for collecting it $18,960. For years and years the republican leaders on this floor have known of these things, and yet every year new ports of entry are established. For years they have known of this leakage from the nation's Treasury, and yet with all the power in their own hands they have made no move toward economy by stopping up the leaks. And still they tell us about reform in the republican party. Can they be longer trusted by an overburdened people?

WE MUST KNOW THE TREE BY ITS FRUITS.

We have seen its fruits during the past winter, during the past few weeks. Here we have seen huddled up in this Hall, with the temperature from 100 to 108, the democratic representatives of the people battling for retrenchment and reform, working day and night to reduce the expenses of the Government, to stop some of the thousands of leaks in the Treasury made by the republican party. We have fought for reform; the republican members of this House and of the Senate have opposed us. They are contending for the spoils; the democratic members are endeavoring to carry out the will of the people. Reform is our battle-cry. Let us stand by the people in this great contest. Talk about reform in the republican party and by republican leaders! Sir, I would as soon expect the Turk to abandon his harem and embrace the Christian religion, or the rushing waters of Niagara to reverse its course. Sir, we can expect no reform at the hands of the republican or administration leaders. When we urge reform on this floor, they shake their political Koran (the "bloody shirt") in our faces. Sir, like famished tigers they have tasted blood—the spoils, the hard-earned money of the people. They are trying to divert the attention of the people from the real issue, but, Mr. Speaker, the people are aroused. The economical, tax-paying business men of the country are aroused. They will not, they cannot be diverted from the real issue. The people are with us now. Let us stand by them in the work of retrenchment and reform.

ANOTHER BROKEN PROMISE.

The republican leaders have promised to reduce the number of civil officials and thereby decrease the expenditures of Government. Here is a book of twelve hundred and eleven pages and another of some six hundred and fifty pages, entitled the registers of the civil list of officials, &c., published and printed by the Department in pursuance of sections 508 and 510 of the Revised Statutes, and commonly called the Blue Book. Here is to be found the name of every Government official; and I here append a statement of the number of employés borne upon the civil list of the United States from 1859 to 1875, inclusive, as compiled and shown in the official registers:

Number of civil employés under—
Mr. Buchanan's administration	44,597
Mr. Lincoln's administration in 1861	46,049
Mr. Lincoln's administration in 1863	47,375
Lincoln's and Johnson's administration in 1865	53,167
President Johnson in 1867	56,113
President Grant in 1869	54,207
President Grant in 1871	57,605
President Grant in 1873	86,660
President Grant in 1875	94,119
President Grant in 1876	102,350

And the Lord only knows what it will be before the expiration of the year 1876.

These figures speak louder than words. They will appeal to the pockets of every business man in the country, to every tax-payer in the land, and when my friend, Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, (the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations,) and his democratic colleagues reported the several appropriation bills reducing the number of civil officials, the republican members on this floor assailed the proposition in the most violent manner. Their rage and fury knew no bounds. They hurled their fury upon the head of these steadfast friends of the people, but yet they stood, and stand to-day, firm as a rock; and I say to Mr. RANDALL and the democrats on this floor that the people expect us to stand as firm as the Macedonian phalanx. There is no necessity for 100,000 civil employés. Mr. Lincoln in time of war could get along with less than half the number. Why this great increase of nearly thirty thousand within the past one or two years? Sir, it is to give employment to the henchmen and time-serving political paupers, to fill up the custom-houses and useless ports of entry, where not a dollar of revenue is collected, to give place and position to political trimmers and election manipulators. Will the country longer submit to be misgoverned, or will it support reform measures and reform men?

In addition to this terrible array of facts the record of the republican party shows that it has constantly disregarded and violated the Constitution of the country; that it has used the Army and Navy for political purposes; that the appropriations made for the support and maintenance of the Navy have been used for carrying elections at the several navy-yards of the country, as the testimony just published will show.

The Army has not been used for the protection of our frontier settlements as contemplated by law, but our Texas border, Arizona, New Mexico, Montana, Wyoming, and other frontier States and Territories have been left to the raids of the Sioux, the Comanches, and the Apaches, who have plundered, murdered, and scalped thousands of the families of the hardy settlers, while the soldiers of the country, paid for by the people, are kept stationed in the Southern States to carry elections for the promotion of such carpet-baggers as Packard, Kellogg, and others. Where is the Army to-day? On the frontier? No.

The following statement will show the present location of the Army:

Total number of troops in the regular Army	26,978
Number of troops stationed in Southern States	7,052
Number of troops at recruiting stations	4,216
Troops in northern forts and posts	4,868

A few thousand are located in the Western and Pacific States, while the gallant Crook is sent to quell the murderous Sioux with but a handful of men. He reports at least five Indians for each soldier. Where is the gallant Custer and his brave followers? Sir, he was sent to fight the Sioux with but two hundred and sixty-nine men. That brave officer and his heroic little command were massacred to a man. Their mangled, mutilated forms lie upon the fields of the Yellowstone, while their comrades in arms, who would gladly have gone to the front with them, are kept in Louisiana, Mississippi, and other Southern States to influence elections. Sir, the blood of Custer and his little band should be charged to the account of your Packards, your Kelloggs, your Ameses, and other republican leaders, and the people will hold them responsible for it.

Another fraud and leakage not enumerated is the printing ring of the District of Columbia. Millions have been squandered in this way to enrich the ring. The Government Printing Office has managed to use over $20,000,000 during the past few years. The testimony of experts before the committee shows that from 40 to 50 per cent. of the money appropriated for public printing has been stolen by the ring, and the Superintendent, Clapp, is handed over to the grand jury for indictment, not by the republican party, but by the democratic House.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask the republican members of this House to point to any department of the Government that is not corrupt. Are they punished? Were the post-office thieves and straw-bidders punished, or even prosecuted? No, sir. Bristow made war upon crooked whisky thieves, and employed Henderson, Dyer, Yaryan, and others to aid him. These good servants of the people were all dismissed, and Mr. Bristow was forced to retire to private life in the blue-grass regions of Kentucky. Ex-Senator Pratt, of Indiana, being ambitious to do right, undertook to punish whisky and revenue frauds. He, too, is invited to retire to private life on the banks of the Wabash. So it goes. "Let no guilty man escape." That is, let no man escape who attempts to crush out fraud. The same administration leaders who stand by the Administration in the dismissal of the good and true servants of the people met in Cincinnati and again thwarted the wishes of the people and placed before the country a candidate who will simply be an automaton in the hands of the men who have been and are to-day the apologists of Kellogg, Warmoth, Packard, Babcock, and other depredators. The action of these political confederates at Cincinnati means but one thing, namely, the continuation in power of the very rings who have plundered the people. It can mean nothing else.

Take the condition of the Southern States. Texas, Arkansas, Alabama, North Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky, and the Virginias are prosperous under democratic rule; but how is it in Louisiana, South Carolina, and Mississippi? Bloodshed, riot, plunder, and robbery have been the order of the day. These States have been under republican rule. Now that Mississippi is democratic no complaints are heard from the people. The State government is managed to the satisfaction of the people, and prosperity is fast returning to all classes. The ring plunderers are dissatisfied, and why? Because under democratic administrations there is no opportunity for plunder. Democrats punish fraud, while the republicans have let the Pinneys and Babcocks and hundreds of others go free; and to-day the republican members on this floor are fighting as one man to keep the military in the South while our kindred are being murdered by savage Sioux in the West.

When we demand economy, when we expose the extravagance of the Administration, we are met by the cry of Ku-Klux, the war, another rebellion, &c. Gentlemen, these dodges will not do. You may evade the scrutiny of an overburdened tax-paying people for a while, but you cannot divert their attention from the fact and record that you have and are to-day opposing economy and reduction in the expenditures of the Government, and that you are the apologists for those who have plundered every department of the Government. Mr. Speaker, the day has come when the people demand that their Representatives shall do their bidding.

The republican leaders and politicians have added to the "bloody shirt" the school and church question. They say the public schools must be maintained. Now, Mr. Speaker, who is opposed to the public-school system of our country as established years ago under democratic administrations? What national, State, county, or municipal convention, what legislative body, has spoken against our glorious public or free school system? Not one in all the land. No, not one. Can the republican members on this floor point to any party or people in the land that have taken, or would take, any steps to injure or break up the public schools? Not one. It is another false issue, another attempt by republican leaders to divert attention from the real question in issue. Gentlemen, in common parlance, "it's too thin." We are all—democrats, republicans, liberals, and independents—for the great free-school system of the country; we are all for the great cause of education.

There is still another dodge to divert the attention of the people from the record. In the last annual message of the President he spoke of "priestcraft," &c. No sooner had Congress assembled than the republican leaders took up the cry and attempted to make political capital out of it, and we have heard murmurs coming from the politicians that the Catholics were overriding the country, that Catholicism must be put down, &c. The republican party made the issue in Oregon last fall against my friend Mr. LANE, and were beaten. I understand that they are trying to make this issue in Ohio this fall. The Cincinnati nominee is a little "Hayes'y" on the subject, and some of his followers met in national convention at Philadelphia on the 4th and 5th of July, 1876, the centennial year, and resolved as follows:

1. That we are in favor of Protestant America being ruled and governed by Protestant Americans.
2. That we will support none but Protestants for office.
3. That we will support and instruct our friends to support and vote for Hayes and Wheeler for President and Vice-President of the United States. (See report of proceedings of convention in the New York Herald, July 6, 1876.)

This is the "raw head and bloody bones" that is to accompany the "bloody shirt." Here in the great centennial year, in the city of brotherly love, at the national exhibition of the world's industry, there in the city that gave birth to liberty and our national existence, where invited guests from every nation had assembled to exhibit their handiwork and join with us in celebrating our nation's birthday, with our banners streaming from every house top emblazoned with golden letters, "Welcome to all the nations of the earth," when all were enjoying the fraternal love and blessings of liberty and the free air of free government, a Government founded on religious liberty and equal rights—there and at that time, when all true patriots and liberty-loving people should have been offering thanks to Almighty God for the blessings He had vouchsafed to the people of the whole country, there and at that time a convention of leaders and workers of the republican party, representing twenty-nine States, assembled in the interest of Hayes and Wheeler and adopted a series of resolutions as herein quoted from the report of the proceedings, resolving that none but "native-born Protestant Americans should govern America," and that Hayes and Wheeler be voted for for the high offices of President and Vice-President of the United States.

How was it in the Catholic countries? Side by side on the same page that gives us the report of the proceedings of this convention or branch of the republican party, we find the following telegrams:

That thousands of Germans were celebrating our nation's birthday in Germany.

That the people of Switzerland celebrated the day, and that it was observed as a great holiday.

That 30,000 Catholic Irishmen marched in procession in the city of Dublin.

What a contrast. Catholics and Protestants of Europe alike, side by side, rejoicing, sending up glad hallelujahs to heaven for the continued prosperity and religious liberty of America; while republican politicians in America—in the very birthplace of liberty—were resolving not only against civil and religious equality, but against nationality and birthright. God bless old Ireland and Irishmen. God bless the noble, liberty-loving Germans and Swiss. Long may they live to set an example to teach these republican politicians the true principles of patriotism and civil and religious liberty. Sir, if history be correct, the Mayflower had streaming from her mast-head when she touched Plymouth Rock, a banner upon which was inscribed:

This is the New World, the land of religious liberty.

From that sentiment the Catholics in the colonial days of Maryland protected all in the exercise of religious liberty and the worship of God. From that sentiment Thomas Jefferson wrote the sacred clause in the Declaration of Independence that guarantees to every human being the right to equality and the worship of God according to the dictation of his own conscience. From that sentiment the article of the Constitution of the United States was adopted—adopted and ratified by the people—which guarantees and protects every human being in the land in the enjoyment of the free exercise of religious liberty. Who is here that would strike that clause from the Declaration of Independence? Who is here that would strike out that article from the Constitution? Do you republicans mean this, or are you only bringing it forward to divert the people from the real issue, that you may for a little while longer hide the cloven foot of corruption? To whom are we indebted for our nationality? To whom are we indebted for the liberties we enjoy to-day? Sir, history answers the question. We are indebted to Catholic France; to her brave Catholic soldiers, led by the patriot, Lafayette. Did Washington and the patriot Army at Valley Forge, when the last ray of hope had fled, resolve that no Catholic should enter the Army to strike for liberty and religious equality? Did they refuse to receive the aid and support of Lafayette and his Catholic legions? No, sir; the old Continentals were patriots. Every one worshiped God as he wished. Each one was fighting for this very principle: the right to "live and let live."

Who stood in the front ranks in the late war for the Union? The Protestant and Catholic stood side by side in the thickest of the battle. No citizen was more patriotic and ready in giving service to the country than the Catholic. Then republican and democrat, foreign and native-born, Catholic and Protestant, stood shoulder to shoulder in the march to victory. No sound of foreign-born or religious proscription was ever tolerated by the great and patriotic Lincoln or his predecessors. That has been left to the centralized power of the present administration party, which stands ready to manufacture and accept any means, however vile, that will perpetuate its ascendency indefinitely to rob the tax-payer and industries of the country.

Would the republican party establish a national religion of Baptists, or a national religion of Methodists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, or Latter-Day Saints? Carry into effect this last dogma or principle of your party as adopted in the convention at Philadelphia, and it is only a question of time when our country and land will be deluged in blood shed in a religious warfare.

Will the people ratify your action and elect Hayes and Wheeler, who promise no reform, no reduction of expenditures, but are backed by a party the leaders of which deny to Americans the constitutional right to worship God according to the fundamental laws of civil liberty? Backed by a party who deny to the gallant, liberty-loving Irishman, German, Swiss, and Frenchman the right to come to this land and partake with us alike of the joys, the comforts, and the blessings of civil and religious liberty bequeathed to us by Lafayette, by French, German, Scot, and Irishman, who, side by side with Washington and the patriots of 1776, shed their blood upon hundreds of battle-fields that they might enjoy and bequeath to posterity a government of civil and religious equality.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the leaders of the republican party have forced upon the American people a treaty with China that is filling our country with a class of cooly or slave laborers for worse and more degrading purposes than was ever known in the history of civilized government. The democratic party and the people entered their solemn protest against the ratification of a treaty that looked to the introduction of slave labor into our country; and when the American consul at Hong-Kong, China, objected to the immigration of cooly or slave laborers the State Department said, "Let them come."

See letter of Secretary of State, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D. C., July 13, 1876.

SIR: Your letter of the 12th instant, asking copies of certain papers on file in the Department in relation to contracts with Chinese laborers, has been received. In reply I have the honor to inclose herein a copy of a dispatch dated the 19th of November, 1869, from the consul at Hong-Kong, and of the Department's reply thereto, under date of the 20th of January, 1870, these being, as is believed, the papers referred to in your letter.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH.

Hon. J. K. LUTTRELL,
House of Representatives.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Hong-Kong, China, November 19, 1869.

SIR: In view of the great magnitude which the matter of Chinese emigration hence to the United States is assuming, and in view of the fact that parties are now here making engagements with Chinese laborers to be taken to the United States and there employed for a term of years, I deem it my duty to ask for specific instructions in this regard.

What constitutes a free and voluntary emigrant? The act to prohibit the cooly trade, passed February 19, 1862, provides that the inhabitants or subjects of China known as "coolies" shall not be transported in American vessels to be disposed of in foreign countries. * * * Does any conflict exist in this law? What is a "cooly" as here defined, and what is a free emigrant? * * * Or, to put this question in a still more practical form, can an individual or company come here and engage Chinese to be employed for a term of days, months, or years in the United States and legally demand of the consul the certificate contemplated in the fourth section of the act aforesaid? * * * It is the custom established by my immediate predecessor to give all vessels, without regard to nationality, sailing hence for ports in the United States with Chinese emigrants, a certified list of such emigrants. For each certificate to emigrant the consul charged $2. * * *

The great importance of this question of emigration, together with the fact that three-fourths of all who leave China will probably depart from this port, will I trust be deemed sufficient excuse for my lengthy dispatch on this subject.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. N. GOULDING,
United States Consul.

Hon. HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Now follows the substance of the reply of the Acting Secretary of State:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 20, 1870.

SIR: I acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 5, of November 19, 1869, in relation to the cooly emigrants.

I am not aware that there is any legal definition of the term "cooly." Its general signification is understood to be a laborer at servile work, but the term has received a particular application to the class who have for many years been the subjects of the commerce known as the cooly trade. * * *

The fact that an emigrant embarks under a contract by which he is to re-imburse the expenses of his transportation by personal services for a period agreed upon does not deprive him of the character of a free and voluntary emigrant, if the contract is not vitiated by force or fraud.

The local knowledge and experience of each consul will enable him to prevent the abuses of the cooly trade without impeding emigration really free and voluntary, without more specific instructions.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

J. C. B. DAVIS,
Assistant Secretary.

C. N. GOULDING, Esq.,
United States Consul, Hong-Kong, China.

Now, when the laboring-men of the country demand a modification of the treaty, the republican leaders demand it too for political effect. In California they declared in favor of "John Chinaman" in their State platforms; called him a man and a brother, naturalized several of them; but the people arose in their might and opposed it, and then the leaders of the republican party changed their base of action for political purposes and made many professions of sympathy with the laboring masses. But the people know how much sympathy they have for free labor. We will not hold the rank and file, the masses of the republican party responsible for the fraud, corruption, and misrule of the leaders of the party, because the leaders have deceived and betrayed the people. They have refused to do the bidding of the people, and the people, republicans and democrats, can only expect honest government by electing a reformer like Governor Tilden to direct the destinies of the people and the Government.

The record is before the people, and there I propose to leave it.

Once more let us have honest government and honest officials.

God give us men! A time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions, and a will;
Men who have honor; men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking;
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking;
For, while the rabble with their thumb-worn creeds,
Their large professions, and their little deeds,
Mingle in selfish strife, lo! Freedom weeps,
Wrong rules the land, and waiting Justice sleeps.

The duty and determination of the democratic party is to maintain a tariff for revenue purposes only; to legislate for the masses, and not for a favored few; to abolish useless ports of entry and dismiss useless officials; to economize in every department of Government; to compel corporations to pay the principal and interest due the Government and the people; to preserve the public lands for the people; to protect the settler against the land-grabber and speculator; to relieve the people of the oppressions practiced by corporations and monopolists; to relieve the people of the high protective tariff and internal-revenue tax; to relieve the people of the burdens of taxation; to increase our commerce; to foster and encourage ship-building; to protect the whole people in the enjoyment of equal rights and of civil and religious liberty; to protect them against bondholders and to compel bondholders to pay taxes; to punish fraud and crime; to protect all men, white or black, in the free exercise of their rights before the law; to foster the cause of education; to maintain and protect every citizen in the free exercise of the ballot; to abolish the system of spies and informers; to prevent a recurrence of Sanborn contracts, Credit Mobilier, Black Friday jobs, straw-bid rings, land rings, Indian rings, and other similar jobs by which the people have been plundered; to give to the people of the frontier protection from savage raids; to enact civil-service reform, economy, good government, and protection to the whole people.

This we promise in the name of all we hold most dear. Seventy-two years of economical and prosperous administration under democratic rule is a sufficient guarantee that we mean just what we say.

Mr. Speaker, we must rise above all partisan feelings and do the bidding of the oppressed millions of laboring men and women of our country. We must remedy the evils of past misrule and bad legislation, bring order out of chaos, expose corruption and fraud, and legislate for retrenchment and reform. In the language of one of the great statesmen of other days, "Our country is in far more danger from corrupt officials than from any other source."

Sir, during the present session I have heard members on this floor make fiery appeals to the prejudices and passions of the populace, and by every subtle art endeavor to incite and stir up the angry passions of the past. Shame upon men who would resort to such infamous means to advance their own selfish political interests or party. Thank Heaven no soldier whose deeds in the battle-field brighten our history has been guilty of such dirty treachery. No, sir; that unholy work is left to the hands of politicians who never smelt gunpowder.

Sir, let us live in peace and amity. Let the "dead past" be forgotten. Let the children of America profit by the unholy acts of the past. Let us stand by the Constitution and the Union, recognizing one flag, the starry banner, guaranteeing equal rights and justice to all. Let union of States, union of hearts, and equal rights, and liberty to all be the watch-word of every American citizen. Let it dwell in the hearts of the people throughout this broad land. Whenever an American mother shall ask God's blessing on her first-born, let her invoke Almighty God to grant us liberty and union forever. When the old veteran of our civil strife shall stand on the border of time, with one foot upon the grave, let him teach a religion of patriotism and brotherly love to a new generation. Let the sentiment that falls from his lips be "Union and liberty, one and inseparable." Let us treasure this love, this sentiment; link it with our fondest hopes, join it with the most sacred of memories, only surpassed by the sanctity and reverence we owe to the great Ruler of all. Let us as a great national family recognize the banner of the brave and the free. Let us guard and defend it as we would our "paternal gods." May it ever, as now, move on in a cause holy as the light. That cause, liberty to all. May the hand that would dare pluck one star from its glory fall palsied beneath the shadow of its fold. May it ever advance, as Thy ark in the olden time—holy in the sight of freemen and angels.

May that banner move on and on over this great continent, freedom's pillar of cloud by day, her pillar of fire by night, until from the ice-bound wilderness of the north to the waters of the southern sea there shall live but one name, one nation, one religion. That name, America! That religion, the brotherhood of man! That nation, the empire of freedom and equal justice to all!

FRAUDS IN THE SOUTH.

From the report on the condition of affairs in the late insurrectionary States I quote the following as showing the debts and liabilities of the State of Louisiana:

Debts and liabilities.

In 1861	$10,099,074 34
In 1868	14,347,051 62
In 1871	41,194,473 91
Excess of expenditures over receipts, 1871	9,345,733 00

Percentage of increase, 1868 to 1871, 200.

Tax levy.

In 1860	4,960,780 00
In 1870	6,490,028 00

Percentage of increase in ten years, 50.

Property valuation.

In 1860	$435,782,265 00
In 1870	251,296,017 02

Percentage of decrease in ten years, 50.

In connection with the general condition of the South I quote from the same report:

"It will thus be seen that while the assessed valuation of the taxable property in the eleven States of the South has been reduced from $4,333,757,942 in 1860 to $2,026,440,971 in 1870, being a loss of $2,307,306,971, or over $300,000,000 more than now remains, the State taxation on what those people now have was in 1870 $12,813,615, while it was $8,165,486 in 1860, when their affairs were managed by their own people; and the county taxation in 1860 on all the property they then owned was only $3,115,184, while now, under carpet-bag and negro rule, it is $14,298,630, or $11,183,446 more on the remnant still in existence than it was on the whole property when the war began.

"In view of the enormous debt which has been wantonly, corruptly, and fraudulently heaped upon a people as poor as the last census report shows the people of the South to be, with five-eighths of their property gone and the taxation on the remnant nearly fourfold as much as it was on the whole when their affairs were honestly managed, is it to be expected that these States will have either love or respect for the men or the party by whom they have thus been plundered?"

We have tried radical reconstruction in the South for nearly ten years; it has proved a failure, except under home rule.

SOUTH CAROLINA—INDEBTEDNESS AND FRAUDS.

From proceedings of the Tax-Payers' Association of South Carolina I cite the following facts as showing the indebtedness and expenditures under carpet-bag rule:

Property valuation.

In 1860	$490,000,000
In 1870	170,000,000

A decline in thirteen years of 67 per cent.

Tax levy.

In 1860	500,000
In 1873	2,700,000

An increase in thirteen years of nearly 500 per cent.

Legislative expenses.

In 1860	40,000
In 1873	291,000

An increase in thirteen years of nearly 700 per cent. The public printing for sixty years aggregated $400,000, or an annual average of $6,666.

Now mark the difference under republican rule, as shown by the following table:

Public printing.

October, 1870, to October, 1871	$134,151 44
October, 1871, to October, 1872	215,129 86
October, 1872, to October, 1873	331,945 66
Undrawn appropriation	118,054 34
Extra session, 1874	125,000 00
Total for three years	924,281 30

Annual average of $308,093.76.

Showing the expense for public printing for three years under republican carpet-bag rule to be $500,000, more than the expense for sixty years under the administration of the democratic citizens of South Carolina before the war. From October 31, 1872, to November 19, 1873, the amount paid for public printing in South Carolina was $575,000, while the total revenues of the State for the same period were but $1,719,728. (See State treasurer's report.)

Annual legislative expenses before the war, $40,000; annual legislative expenses since the war, $300,000; an increase of more than 700 per cent., while property has decreased more than 100 per cent.

The annual stationery bill of the Legislature before the war was $400; the annual stationery bill of the Legislature since the war, $16,000, or over 4,000 per cent.

The amount of taxes paid by State and legislative officials under republican carpet-bag rule is as folllows:

The governor pays none; the secretary of state pays none; the comptroller-general pays none; the treasurer pays none; the superintendent of education pays none; the lieutenant-governor pays $15.99; the adjutant and inspector general pays $1.

The State Legislature is composed of fifty-seven white and ninety-eight colored members. Of these fifty-seven whites twenty-four pay no taxes, and of the ninety-eight colored sixty-seven pay no taxes; and the names of eighty-five members of the Legislature are not to be found upon the tax-books; a State governed by men who do not represent a single interest, who create taxes, but pay none. (See report of tax-payers; also report joint committee on condition of the South, Congressional Globe, volume 2, page 1239.)

EXPENSE OF PRINTING RINGS IN WASHINGTON AS COMPARED WITH OTHER STATE GOVERNMENTS.

Statement showing the amount appropriated for executive officers, printing, advertising, and contingencies by the following States during the year 1871, and by the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, also population and number of square miles in each.

States.	Population last census.	Square miles.	Salaries of executive officers.	Printing and advertising.	Contingencies.	Total.
New York	4,387,464	47,000	$139,550	$175,000	$19,200	$323,750
Maine	626,915	31,760	65,133	35,000	17,400	117,533
New Hampshire	318,300	9,280	12,341	9,830	2,099	24,270
Massachusetts	1,457,351	7,800	214,205	98,531	30,300	363,036
Rhode Island	217,353	1,300	16,908	3,500	*	20,408
Connecticut	537,454	4,670	59,800	98,875	*	156,675
New Jersey	906,096	8,320	46,187	82,625	7,656	136,468
Ohio	2,665,260	39,960	73,275	75,300	13,250	183,925
Wisconsin	1,064,985	53,920	65,963	54,569	17,008	137,540
Iowa	1,192,092	55,040	41,205	49,495	22,433	113,133
Illinois	2,539,891	55,410	26,753	50,000	39,108	115,861
District of Columbia	131,700	60	449,220	143,635	200,000	792,855

Now, taking the legislative expenses of South Carolina for 1873 at $291,000, and public printing at $331,945.66, the two items make $622,945.66, or nearly 100 per cent. more than the entire cost of the State government of New York; while taking the cost of public printing alone for three years in the State of South Carolina the sum-total, $924,231.30, exceeds the annual cost of the annual State governments of New York, Massachusetts, and Ohio by $117,533.

The testimony taken by the committee shows that the cost of public printing in Washington is from 50 to 60 per cent. above the average cost of similar work in New York or other democratic States.

NAVY-YARD TICKETS.

The workmen were forced to walk in line and vote these little paste-board slips or be discharged.

Many gallant soldiers of the late war refused to walk in line and be forced to vote the ticket, and for demanding and exercising the rights of freemen they were discharged by the political "bosses" who govern the navy-yards.

Fac-simile October election ticket. Printed on card-board with marbled back; no margin.

For Justices of the Supreme Court, Long Term, A. L. Rhodes; Short Term, Addison C. Niles; For Superintendent of Public Instruction, H. N. Bolander. For Justices of the Peace, C. W. Riley, O. A. Munn.

The republican governor, Bullock, of Georgia, incurred a State debt of nearly twenty-five millions. The democrats have, under their administration, in three years reduced it to eight millions; and to-day Georgia State bonds are worth 101½ to 102 in gold—above par. (See Comptroller's report and current market reports.)

ALABAMA UNDER DEMOCRATIC RULE.

Governor Houston took charge of the State government of Alabama less than two years ago. He found a State-debt of over thirty millions, the result of radical carpet-bag misrule. The debt, under democratic rule, is now reduced to $10,000,000. I here append a few official tables, prepared by the Department, showing the condition of the country. Goods and merchandise under the republican tariff of 1875 have increased, while the prices of labor have diminished. (See reports of Commissioner of Agriculture for May and June, 1876, page 155.)

WAGES OF FARM LABOR—MONTHLY RATE WITHOUT BOARD, 1866 AND 1875.

This diagram shows the monthly rate of each State, in both the years named, from the exhaustive investigations of the Department. There is shown a decline in wages, except in some of the Southern States, where labor is becoming more efficient and valuable, and in Oregon, where a scarcity exists. The figures are as follows:

States.	1866.	1875.	States.	1866.	1875.

TABLE III.

[Extract and tables from the speech of Hon. S. S. Cox, July 15, 1876.]

But if the gentleman wants really good, genuine economy, I advise him to go to the annual message of the governor of the State of New York, Samuel J. Tilden, of whom he has perhaps heard. He will find a variety of good reading in the line of economy. In the latter part of that message he will read why economy is so indispensable both in Federal and local affairs. According to that statement our Federal, State, county, city, and town taxes amounted in 1870 in currency to $730,591,521 against $83,000,000 gold in 1850 and $154,000,000 gold in 1860. The taxes in 1870 were $18.91 a head against $3.57 in 1850 and $4.90 in 1860. These taxes are eating up not merely income and earnings, all through the country. In 1870 the Federal taxes amounted to $450,000,000, while the State, county, city, and town taxes amounted to $280,000,000. Perhaps it would be better to express these amounts in tabular form.

The aggregate Federal taxation of the eleven years now closing, computed in currency from the official statements, is more than $4,500,000,000; the local taxation, assuming the census statement for 1870 as an average, is more than $3,000,000,000; the aggregate taxation exceeds $7,500,000,000.

The extravagance of our governmental consumption is illustrated by a comparison of the public expenditures of 1870, five years after the close of the war, with those of 1860 and 1850:

TAXES IN THE UNITED STATES.

	1850.	1860.	1870.

If the gentleman would not disdain to learn more from this message, he may find in it that the daily wants of the masses of mankind, even in the most produc tive and prosperous countries, press closely upon their daily earnings. It is only a small portion of their current income which they are able to save and to accumulate.

"In Great Britain and Ireland, despite the wealth which their people have long been storing up, especially in machinery and moneyed capital, despite the yearly influx of $150,000,000 from interest on investments in other countries, the annual growth of wealth from the savings of all their people is not deemed by the best authorities to exceed six or seven hundred million dollars.

"The accumulated wealth of the United States is the result of a shorter period of growth and is less in amount. We have to pay to foreign creditors annually in coin more than $100,000,000. We are richer in the natural powers of the soil, and our labor is, on the whole, more efficient. We earn more, but have less disposition to save and less of the habit of saving."

What will my colleague think when he further learns that a governmental consumption in every year, in bad as well as good years, must be considered greatly excessive when it amounts to a share of the national earnings larger than the whole people are able to save in prosperous times for all new investments; for erecting dwellings and other buildings; for improving farms, increasing the stock of live animals and of agricultural implements; for all manufacturing and mechanical constructions and machinery; for all warehouses and stores and increased supplies of merchandise; for ships and steamers and telegraphs and railroads and their equipments; for all objects which individual and corporate enterprise provide for the future in the progress of a populous and rapidly growing community.

Such taxation is in itself a monstrous evil, and its incidents aggravate its direct injuries. When the exaction from the people was, as in 1860, one-quarter of its present amount per head, even if it were unscientific and unskillful in the levy, the mischief was comparatively inconsiderable. But with the quadruplication of the exaction, the difficulty of obtaining good methods of imposing it is greatly increased, and the mischiefs of bad methods become well-nigh intolerable.

When governments take from the people, for official expenditure, nearly all the surplus earnings of individuals, science and skill in the art of taxation become necessary; necessary to preserve and enlarge the revenue, necessary to gild the infliction to the tax-payers. Our present situation is that we have more than European burdens, as seen in the most costly governments of the richest of modern nations, supporting immense navies and armies and public debts; and to these burdens we have conjoined an ignorance and incompetency in dealing with them which are peculiarly our own. We have not yet acquired the arts belonging to a system which the founders of the American Government warned us against and fondly believed would never exist in this country.

The consequence is that the pecuniary sacrifices of the people are not to be measured by the receipts into the Treasury. They are vastly greater. A tax that starts in its career by disturbing the natural courses of private industry and impairing the productive power of labor, and then comes to the consumer distended by profits of successive intermediaries and by insurance against the risks of a fickle or uncertain governmental policy and of a fluctuating governmental standard of value, blights human well-being at every step. When it reaches the hapless child of toil, who buys his bread by the single loaf and his fuel by the basket, it devours his earnings and inflicts starvation.

Another evil of such a system of excessive taxation is that it creates and nourishes a governmental class, with tendencies to lessen services and to enlarge compensation, to multiply retainers, to invent jobs and foster all forms of expenditure—tendencies unrestrained by the watchful eye and firm hand of personal interest, which alone enable private business to be carried on successfully. In other countries such a class has found itself able, sometimes by its own influence and sometimes in alliance with the army, to rule the unorganized masses.

In our country it has become a great power, acting on the elections by all the methods of organization, of propagating opinion, of influence, and of corruption. The system, like every living thing, struggles to perpetuate its own existence.

Every useful and necessary governmental service, at a proper cost, is productive labor. Every excess beyond that, so far as it is saved by the official, merely transfers to him what belongs to the people. So far as such excess is consumed, it is a waste of capital as absolute as if wheat of equal value were destroyed by fire or gold were sunk in the ocean.

Probably such waste by governmental expenditure in the eleven years since the war amounts to at least as much as our present national debt.

My colleague may also learn that the misgovernment in the South is another call for economy.

And yet my colleague would disregard economy.

It cannot be doubted that the systematic and extreme misgovernment imposed on the States of the South has greatly detracted from our national prosperity. In those impoverished communities it has not stopped with the ordinary effects of ignorant and dishonest administration. It has inflicted upon them enormous issues of fraudulent bonds, the scanty avails of which were wasted or stolen, and the existence of which is a public discredit, tending to bankruptcy or repudiation. Its taxes, generally oppressive, in some instances have confiscated the entire income of property and totally destroyed the marketable value.

It therefore became indispensable that not only the governors of States but the legislators in the Federal Congress should cut down these enormous taxes that were eating up the earnings and substance of our people.

In compliance, therefore, with the generous leave of the House to extract from our governor lessons of economy for the whole country, I conclude by calling attention to his first pronunciamento at Syracuse, on the 17th September, 1874, before taking upon himself the active candidacy of that year, which made him our governor by 50,000 majority:

"One thing only remains in its integrity; that is our taxes. Amid general decay, taxation puts out new sprouts and grows luxuriantly.

"'It seats itself'—

if I may borrow a figure from the greatest of our American poets—

"'upon the sepulcher,
And of the triumphs of its ghastly foe
Makes its own nourishment.'

"National taxes, State taxes, county taxes, town taxes, municipal taxes. The collector is as inevitable as the grim messenger of death. Incomes, profits, wages; all these fall, but taxes rise.

"Six years ago, I had occasion to say that while values were ascending, and for some time after, it might be easy to pay these taxes out of the froth of our apparent wealth; but that when the reaction of an unsound system of government finance should set in, the enormous taxations which that system had created would consume not only our incomes and profits, but trench upon our capital. What was then prediction is now experience.

"Retrenchment in public expenditure. Reform in public administration. Simplification and reduction of tariffs and taxes. Accountability of public officers, enforced by better civil and criminal remedies. The people must have these measures of present relief—measures for economy for the future.

"A change of men is necessary to secure the change of measures. The opposition is being matured and educated to take the administration. The democracy, with the traditions of its best days, will form the nucleus of the opposition."

The taxies levied by the Legislature of 1874 were 7½ mills on a valuation of $2,169,307,873. Their produce, when all realized, is $15,727,482.08.

The taxes levied by the Legislature of 1875 were 6 mills. They were computed in the comptroller's office and in the legislative committees on the valuation of the previous year. On that basis their produce would have been $13,015,847.24.

The reduction would have been $2,711,634.84, but the valuation was increased to $2,367,780,102. The produce of a 6-mills tax on that amount is $14,206,680.61. The increase of the valuation gives an excess over the estimated amount of $1,190,833.37. The reduction actually effected is $1,520,801.47.

A reduction of taxes, without reduction in appropriations, would but create a deficiency and a floating debt. These would have to be paid by a subsequent increase of taxes. The appropriation bills were framed to correspond with the lower valuation, and much effort was made to keep down the appropriations. The result is shown in the following table:

Appropriations and taxes of 1874 compared.

After one year of democratic rule in the Empire State the State taxes were reduced, as compared with the last year of republican rule, to the extent of two and three-quarters millions of dollars.

The governor promised, if the people should send him a Legislature to co-operate with him, to make twice as large a reduction in the taxes next year. This Legislature did not come; but he did well without such a body, as the governor's message reveals. I am allowed graciously to print from it:

"The reduction in the appropriations of 1875, below the taxes of 1874—counting, as its true construction, one item about which there may be some doubt—is $2,554,677.65. This leaves the sum of $1,033,875.18 applicable to the reduction of taxes for the coming fiscal year.

From these figures from Governor Tilden's message my colleagues may learn what benefit our governor has bestowed on our State; and he as well as others may infer how much benefit an economist may render to the whole nation when he may select a cabinet of honest officials and demand accountability in Federal as he has in State matters.

How the Farmers, the Mechanics, and the Laboring Men of the Country are Made to Pay the Government Taxes.

SPEECH OF HON. ELI J. HENKLE,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 29, 1876.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3926) to amend the laws relative to internal revenue—

Mr. HENKLE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I am exceedingly reluctant to trespass upon the time of the House at this late period of the session. Many measures of great importance and absolutely essential to the proper administration of the various departments of the Government yet remain unadjusted, and the attention of the House will properly be engrossed by their consideration until they shall have been disposed of. A great national contest is also rapidly approaching, and daily attracts more and more of the attention of the people and their representatives, so that it appears extremely doubtful if, in the present feverish condition of the public mind, the members of this body can be induced to deliberate calmly and carefully upon any public measure not absolutely indispensable to the business of the present session.

Notwithstanding these unfavorable circumstances, however, a sense of duty to those who have delegated me to represent and protect their interests here impels me to speak upon a subject which to me appears to be of the most vital importance to the interests and welfare of millions of the inhabitants of our common country. I refer to our revenue laws and the sources from whence are derived the means with which to defray the expenses of the General Government.

A more important subject cannot possibly engage our attention at the present time. Its influences pervade every rank of society, and affect, to a greater or lesser extent, the material interests of every individual in the land. No subject, perhaps, has attracted so much of the attention of statesmen in the past history of our country, and upon none has such diversity of opinion been entertained and advocated. Hence its careful study and mature consideration are of the most paramount importance at the present critical crisis in our history. There is a wide-spread and deep-seated conviction in the minds of a majority of the people of the country that these laws can and should be so modified as to lighten the burdens of taxation now imposed upon a class of our citizens most grievously oppressed by adverse fortune, and to place them where they more justly belong.

We cannot shut our eyes against the painful truth that there is deep distress and impending ruin everywhere in the land. With gradual but constantly advancing strides, financial embarrassment has obstructed the pathway of our people until destitution has become a common lot and thousands upon thousands of the best people of the country, willing and anxious to toil for a bare support, are actually suffering for the necessaries of life.

The disasters that have befallen the poor and middle classes have not stopped there. The same causes that have brought the toiling millions to want and beggary have dragged down in the common wreck the capitalist, the merchant, and the tradesman also. Bankruptcies, the like of which were never before known in our history, are the current events of the day. Agriculture, manufactures, and commerce are paralyzed beyond precedent, and utter want of confidence pervades every branch of industry and every avenue of trade, and reflecting men are forced to study seriously the signs of the times, and, if possible, to suggest the causes and the remedy for the impending ruin.

I do not contend that all of this wide-spread distress is attributable to any solitary defect in our existing laws.

I believe there are many causes, each contributing its respective share toward the general depression of the times.

The infidelity and notorious dishonesty of men in the highest and most responsible positions of the public service have annually diverted to private emolument millions of the people's money that should have gone to pay the interest on our national debt and defray the current expenses of the country.

This system of peculation by men in high places has pervaded every arm of the public service and, as now abundantly shown, has robbed the coffers of our common country of untold millions and to the same extent increased our burdens of taxation.

Habits of public and private extravagance contracted under the inflation of values that ensued upon the war still exist among the people, and have been followed by their representatives in the administration of the affairs of the Government.

The high rates of interest upon money, also brought about by the wretched monetary system now prevailing in the land, have contributed much toward the general distress, but these all together make up but a part of the sum of our evils, and much the greater portion I am sure depends upon the operation of our present revenue laws and their unjust discrimination against the interests of the poor.

The present taxes imposed upon the home productions of our country under the internal-revenue laws, and the duties imposed upon certain articles of import, contribute, in my opinion, more than all other causes to impoverish the people of the country and hinder their prosperity.

The many are taxed for the benefit of the few and the burden falls most heavily upon those least able to bear it.

I would not propose nor advocate a sudden and entire abandonment of the system by which the revenues of the country are now supplied.

This, I am free to admit, might lead to embarrassment, and impair the credit of the nation.

Our needful current expenses should be promptly met and the interest of our public debt must be paid in order that national honor may be maintained both at home and abroad; but the principles upon which our present revenue laws are based are, in my opinion, theoretically and practically erroneous, unjust, and oppressive, and so soon as practicable they should be abandoned and a more equitable system enacted in their stead.

I say that the principle upon which the present system is based is unjust and oppressive because in its practical operation the taxes imposed by the General Government are personal taxes, and not taxation upon the capital or property of the country.

The taxes or duties imposed by the internal-revenue laws are taxes or duties laid upon articles consumed or used by our citizens, have no reference to the ability of the parties to pay them, and, for the most part, are imposed upon articles which are of universal use and required alike by the poor and rich.

There is a good old maxim incorporated into the organic law of Maryland which expresses the true and only principle upon which every system of taxation should be based, and that is that "every individual should contribute to the support of the Government in proportion to his worth in real and personal property." This is the principle observed almost universally by our State and municipal governments in levying contributions for their support. But it is notoriously true that the General Government observes no such rule, and the imposition of its taxes bears no proportion to the ability of the party to pay, and this brings me to the demonstration of my assertion and the citation of the proofs of the correctness of my position.

The current ordinary expenses of the General Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, including interest on the public debt and contribution to the sinking fund, amounted to $274,623,392.84.

The means to defray this immense expenditure were derived chiefly from internal-revenue taxes and duties on imports.

More than $110,500,000 was realized from internal-revenue taxes, and over $157,000,000 from duties on imports.

These two items of taxation, with the gold premium upon imports added, make a sum equal to all the ordinary expenses of the Government, except only about three and a half millions of dollars.

Now, I ask, who pay these large sums of money annually? And are the expenses of the nation, as embraced in these sources of revenue, paid by her citizens in proportion to their ability to pay? The people want to know who pays the bills of the Government. They have a right to know the whole truth, and if it shall appear that the taxes imposed are unjust and oppressive, they have a right to a speedy remedy.

The internal revenue for the year ending June 30, 1875, as already stated, amounted to $110,545,154.23. Of this amount $98,529,457.41 was derived from taxes upon distilled spirits, fermented liquors, and tobacco, and only $12,015,696.82 from all other sources. That is, near nine-tenths of all the internal revenue is realized from the tax imposed upon distilled spirits, fermented liquors, and tobacco, and I claim that at least nine-tenths of this amount have been taken from the pockets of the laboring people of the country. In other words, that of the one hundred and ten and a half millions of dollars thus annually paid into the Treasury, about ninety millions are paid by a class of our citizens at once the least able to pay and the most sorely oppressed by the evils that now beset us.

I have not been able, either from the Bureau of Statistics or elsewhere, to obtain reliable information as to the relative numbers of rich and poor in the land, but from the best information to be had, and from a careful study of the subject, I am convinced that at least nine-tenths of our entire population are dependent upon daily labor for a support, and until convinced that I am in error I shall assume this proportion to be sufficiently accurate for the purposes of my argument.

The tax levied upon spirits, tobacco, and fermented liquors is for the most part a uniform, specific tax, and has little reference to the quality or value of the article; hence it follows that those who use equal quantities pay an equal proportion of the tax, the amount of the tax being invariably added to the cost of the article and paid by the consumer.

Now these articles are used quite as generally and as freely by the laboring classes as by the rich, and nine-tenths of our population belonging to the former class, it follows that they pay nine-tenths of all this tax.

Every one knows that the cost of these articles is largely increased on account of the Government tax imposed upon them. It is first imposed by the internal-revenue officers upon the manufacturer. He adds it to the price of the goods when he sells to the retailer, and the retailer more than adds it when he sells to the consumer; so that the duty is really and invariably paid by the consumer of the article, and the class that uses the most pays the most.

From the beginning of this species of taxation in 1862, to June 30, 1875, there were collected from the tax on spirits the sum of $489,763,999.14, and from tobacco, for the same period, the sum of $293,589,425.94, making in all from these two sources of revenue the immense sum of $783,353,425.08; and nine-tenths at least of this vast sum, or more than $700,000,000, have been taken from the hard earnings of the poor men of the country, the class of citizens whom no State government compels to bear any part of the public burdens, and who, from their needy condition, should not be so taxed by any government.

For fear of being misunderstood, Mr. Speaker, I will briefly repeat the points of my argument. They are these:

First. That about nine-tenths of the internal revenue are derived from the taxes on spirits, fermented liquors, and tobacco.

Second. That these articles are used as generally and as freely by the poorer as by the wealthier classes.

Third. That these taxes are mostly specific taxes, assessed on the quantity without regard to the quality of the article; so that every individual pays directly in proportion to the quantity he consumes or uses.

Fourth. That the poorer class being nine times as numerous as the rich, it inevitably follows that they pay nine times as much of all this tax as the rich pay, and hence have paid into the national Treasury in the last thirteen years over $700,000,000 upon the spirits and tobacco they have used.

Fifth. That this species of taxation is actually personal taxation—taxation by the head, without any reference whatever to the ability of the parties to pay. It is not taxation levied upon property or capital, and consequently ignores and violates the fundamental principles upon which every system of taxation in free governments should be founded. It practically and truly makes the muscle and sweat of the poor man pay nine times as much toward the support of the nation as the capital and property of the country pays.

I am well aware, Mr. Speaker, that the views and arguments I am presenting are at variance with the established policy and practice of our national administrations for many years past. The present is, in my opinion, a most crafty and ingenious scheme of financiering, inaugurated and enforced by the republican party to make the poor pay the bills while the rich enjoy the benefits and protection of the Government; and, sir, until I shall be convinced that I am in error, I shall not hesitate to espouse a cause which I am now convinced is the cause of the oppressed and suffering poor of the land.

They are not here in person to raise their voice in the councils of the nation and demand relief. They cannot quit the plow, the anvil, and the work-bench. The merchant, the money-lender, and the tax-gatherer must be paid, and they must toil on week after week and year after year, through summer's heat and winter's cold, to feed and clothe their wives and little ones; but they have delegated us to look to their interests here and protect them. They have intrusted their future fortunes and destiny to our keeping, trusting, hoping, and praying that relief may yet be found, and if we fail to do our duty, a day of reckoning is not far distant.

The wolf is at the door. To-day a wail of woe is heard in every cottage in the land, and woe be unto the public servant that turns a deaf ear to the cry!

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to advocate a sudden and entire abolition of all internal-revenue taxes, but to call attention to the unjust and unequal operation of the present laws, to insist upon a speedy reduction of existing rates and their entire abolition at the earliest practicable period by the substitution of other and more equitable methods of raising a revenue.

I know that for many generations this has been the favorite resort of nations, especially monarchies, to procure the means of defraying public expenditures.

It is the most specious method of taxing the people without the interposition of a direct-tax gatherer, and of exacting from them their hard earnings without giving a receipt specifying the amount taken.

The direct-tax gatherer is an unwelcome visitor, and the items of his bill are closely scrutinized, and, for the most part, grudgingly paid; but could the laboring people of this country realize the full amount and extent of the taxation now stealthily imposed upon articles entering into the daily use and consumption of themselves and their families, a solemn, earnest protest would speedily be heard from every section of the land that would not be stifled until relief was given.

The argument chiefly relied upon by the advocates of the present system, and by them considered all-sufficient and unanswerable, is that distilled spirits, fermented liquors, and tobacco are not necessaries of life; that they are really luxuries, and as such are legitimate objects for taxation. It is true, sir, they are not essential to the sustenance of life. The world would in all probability be better off without them. Millions of dollars would annually be saved to our people, their happiness promoted, life prolonged, and crime diminished; but unfortunately such is the invincible power of appetite over the will that but few who ever become addicted to their use abandon them.

The habits acquired, for the most part in early life, grow stronger and stronger with advancing years until they become a part of our nature and will be satisfied. Practically they have become necessaries of life to all who are addicted to their use, and in the question of taxation should be so considered. With equal and even greater propriety might tea and coffee be considered as luxuries.

There is more nutriment in a glass of spirits than in a cup of coffee, and ten times more in a bottle of beer than in a cup of tea, yet these articles, the appetite for which is as much acquired as that for spirits and tobacco, are treated by the law very properly as necessaries of life and exempt from taxation, while the malt and spirituous liquors, the almost universal beverages of our native-born and naturalized citizens, are encumbered with a burdensome tax. More than two dollars per head for every man, woman, and child in the country was paid into the public Treasury last year from taxes imposed upon these three articles, and it bore just as heavily upon the payers as if the tax had been levied upon the most absolute necessaries of life. The tax is just as grievous a burden, when laid in equal amount, upon the poor man's beer as upon his bread. He is that much poorer at the end of the year, and that much money has been taken from the support of himself and family.

The advocates of temperance reform may say that to admit these articles to a free market is to encourage their use, and would lead to the increase of misery and crime in the country.

If that were probable, then I would say, double the tax rather than diminish it. But, sir, the history of the past abundantly proves that such would not be the effect.

The statistics of the country plainly show that the consumption of these articles is not affected either one way or the other by the imposition of an excise tax.

As large a quantity of distilled spirits, in proportion to population, was consumed in the country when the tax was $2 per gallon as when it was but fifty cents.

Congress in establishing the present rates of taxation upon these articles did not resolve itself into a temperance society or a reformatory institution. It was not expected nor intended that the tax would diminish their use or the crimes that ensued therefrom. Revenue money in the Treasury to pay the public demands, and relieve the capital of the country from legitimate taxation, was the sole object, and had the tax diminished consumption, its very object would have been defeated.

These duties were imposed with a full knowledge of the weakness of human nature and the inexorable demands of an acquired taste. Those who passed them knew that, notwithstanding the duties imposed, the articles would be consumed all the same, and money would flow into the coffers of the Treasury. And so it has; and, as before stated, under the system now enforced, seven hundred millions of dollars of the hard earnings of the yeomanry of the land have been taken from the wages of their daily toil which should have been derived from other sources.

These facts and arguments show conclusively, to my mind, that this system of taxation is wrong in theory and oppressive in its operations, and by it the poorer classes are made to pay almost all the revenue arising from the internal taxes, and the property and capital of the country escape the burden.

There is another reason, Mr. Speaker, and, in my opinion, a still stronger one, why the tax now imposed upon the articles named should be reduced and finally abolished. They are agricultural productions. The tobacco that is manufactured into so many different forms for consumption and the grain from which fermented and distilled spirits are made are the productions of the soil, and the great agricultural interests of the country are injuriously affected by their taxation.

We are pre-eminently an agricultural people. The farming interest is greater than any other in the country and almost equal to all others combined. More than twenty millions of our population depend upon the products of the soil for their support, and hence they are entitled to and should receive the largest share of our fostering care and attention.

In every age of our history the prosperity of the nation has borne a direct ratio to the prosperity of her agriculture.

Whenever the husbandman has realized a bounteous return for his outlay and labor and has not been subjected to unequal taxation, this great interest has prospered and the entire country with it. But whenever, notwithstanding a plentiful harvest, the cost of production has been increased and the remuneration diminished by reason of oppressive and unequal taxation, the agricultural interest has languished, the farmer has become impoverished, and the whole nation has been made to feel the shock. Such is the condition of affairs at the present time.

Notwithstanding the fact that the fruits of the earth have been more abundant than ever before in our history, such is the increased cost to the farmer for the means of living, and so burdensome has been the weight of taxation, direct and indirect, imposed upon him, that the entire interest is in a condition of distressing and alarming depression, and the whole nation feels it.

The mainspring of all the financial embarrassment that now pervades every section of our country is found, beyond doubt, in the prostrated condition of her agriculture.

A specific tax laid upon any article or commodity of trade must, in the very nature of things, affect the traffic in that article or commodity in direct proportion to the extent of the tax.

Now the tax laid upon distilled spirits is about six times the first cost of manufacture, and the tax laid upon leaf-tobacco is almost in the same proportion. With such immense exactions imposed upon the trade, who can doubt that the price realized by the farmer for the raw material is seriously affected thereby?

If the distiller did not have to pay ninety cents per gallon to the Government for taxes, he could afford to pay the farmer a much more liberal price for his grain; and so of the tobacco merchant and manufacturer.

A very considerable proportion of the distilled spirits used in the country is used in the arts and for mechanical and scientific purposes. The increased price of these spirits directly and seriously affects their sale for such purposes; and, to the extent that their sale for such purposes is diminished, the demand for the grain from which they are made is lessened.

But it is in respect of our foreign trade in these articles that our present revenue laws most seriously affect the interests of the farmer and the manufacturer. With no tax upon distilled spirits and tobacco, and none of the complicated and protracted formalities that now surround the exportation of these articles, our country ought to supply the world. Our immense and inexhaustible resources for their production, and our great facilities for their transportation to the seaboard, afford us natural advantages unequaled in any country, and but for the embarrassments thrown around their exportation by our revenue laws, there can be no doubt that our export trade in distilled spirits and manufactured tobacco would be tenfold greater than at present.

It is true there is no revenue tax imposed upon spirits or tobacco that is exported to foreign countries, but the bonds to be executed and the formalities to be complied with for the protection of the Government against frauds are so numerous and so difficult as to very seriously embarrass and almost destroy the trade. What these difficulties are and how they have had the effect to constantly diminish our foreign export trade, are clearly shown by the following extract from the speech of Hon. EDWIN R. MEADE, of New York, recently delivered in this House upon this same subject. He says:

It should require no argument to satisfy any one that the true policy of the Government is to encourage any business which will give us exportation for our staple products; for it is only by our export trade that we are able to make a set-off to the large, and we might say extravagant, importations which require the payment of enormous sums of money abroad. Since our tremendous war debt, which has been so largely taken by foreigners, the necessity for developing in every possible manner all our opportunities for exportation is greatly increased.

In the matter of distilled spirits the United States is so situated respecting the cheapness of her grains, and especially corn, and also in facilities for bringing those grains to the seaboard for shipment, that we ought to monopolize substantially the entire trade of the world in distilled spirits; and yet for some inscrutable reason it would appear, from the laws regulating exportation of such spirits as well as from the regulations of the Department having the subject in charge, that it had become the settled policy of this Government to impede as far as practicable all business enterprise in that direction. How far this Chinese policy has been a success may be discovered by the following:

Statement showing the exports of distilled spirits from the United States for the twenty fiscal years from 1857 to 1876 inclusive.

*Exports for June are partly estimated.

It will be perceived from the foregoing exhibit that the export business was in a flourishing condition up to 1864, when the internal-revenue laws first affected it. From that time on there has been a steady average decline until this date, showing a difference between the receipts for the years 1863 and 1875 of over $3,000,000 loss to this country by reason of the pernicious system which has been adopted respecting the exports of distilled spirits, to say nothing of the large natural increase of trade which would undoubtedly but for this system have amounted ere this to a sum in the neighborhood of $20,000,000; all of which is lost not only to the country generally but to the farmer in particular, who by reason of such additional demand would have been able to obtain a much better price for his grain, where fifty six pounds is concentrated into four pounds of high-proof alcohol. There is no other way in which the western farmer can send his grain abroad to such advantage to himself and American manufactures as in the shape of distilled spirits.

A simple illustration of the manner in which the exporter of spirits is embarrassed would be as follows: A single package of alcohol, containing say eighty-five gallons, is worth say 25 cents per proof-gallon, or $21.25 for the entire package. Now, in order to make shipment abroad the exporter is required to make out two bonds: first, from the distillery to the place of exportation and to the time of actual shipment, and, second, a bond covering the period from time of actual shipment to its landing in foreign port. The exported article pays no duty here, yet nevertheless each of these bonds are required to be made out for double the amount of duty which would be required upon a package in case consumption were had here, or, say, $143. The first bond of course is taken up at the time of the issue of the second, but the second bond cannot be canceled until all the circumlocutory proofs are furnished which are technically required by the Department, and it generally happens that from twelve to eighteen months must elapse before any such shipment bond can be taken up and canceled, so that it comes to be that in a very small business the amount of bonds alone required to carry it on is so great that no one of average or even large means can continue in it.

The figures I have given for the probable present natural exportation of spirits may seem large, but in 1863 we were beginning to export largely, not merely alcohol, but cologned spirits and other finer forms of spirits, and there were reliable indications of the development abroad of a demand for bourbon and rye whiskies of American manufacture; and furthermore our manufactures of drugs and chemicals and toilet articles were building up a large export trade, especially with South America, in compounds of which alcohol was an essential part. Cramped as it has been by law, the exportation of spirits has suffered still more from the varied and contradictory decisions and regulations of the Bureau, which, issued often without the semblance of authority of law, and sometimes almost in plain violation of it, destroyed all security or permanency in the business. For example, at one time, by one of these regulations, no bonds were accepted without qualification upon entirely unencumbered real estate. A man might own a piece of property worth $1,000,000, but if there was a mortgage on it for $10,000 he was not available as security on an exportation bond.

This is but one of many illustrations of the obstacles which are constantly harassing and embarrassing the trade, and shows the absolute necessity for a rigid and thorough reform in the entire system regulating the manufacture and trade in distilled spirits. The particular evil, as we have before observed, lies in the very grave defects in the official system and the enormous, disproportionate, and suicidal tax of ninety cents per gallon, in the face of all experience in favor of a lower rate.

So of manufactured tobacco. The restrictions thrown around the exportation of this article especially are so complicated and difficult as to reduce our exports to a mere fraction of what they would be if trade were untrammeled.

Without elaborating these points at greater length, enough has been stated, I believe, to demonstrate that the great bulk of the internal revenue is paid by the poorer classes of the people, and that these taxes being imposed upon the agricultural products of the country operate with double force and injustice upon that great interest.

An analysis of the tariff of duties imposed upon foreign imports will show that in very many respects the same principle of taxation has been followed, and that the poorer classes pay there also by far too large a proportion of all that is paid into the Treasury from such sources.

The very learned and exhaustive review of this subject that has been presented to the House by the able chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. WILLIAM R. MORRISON] has left but little for others to say upon this subject. I will content myself by a reference to one or two articles only, the duties upon which, as now collected, bear most oppressively upon the masses of our citizens. In round numbers about $40,000,000, currency, were paid into the Treasury last year from duties upon sugar, molasses, and sirups imported into the country; near $1 each for every man, woman, and child in the land.

Now sugar, molasses, and sirups are actual necessaries of life. After bread and meat there are no articles that enter so universally and so largely into the daily bill of fare of every individual in the land, from the highest to the lowest and from the cradle to the grave, as these.

If nine-tenths of the people are poor, then the poor pay nine-tenths of the duty; that is, $30,000,000 are annually added to the cost of the sugar and molasses with which the poor men of the country provide themselves and their families. My friends from the sunny South will claim that this duty is imposed for the protection of the sugar-planters of their section, and hence is a protection to that portion of our agriculture. That argument might be a very good one if the protection did not cost so dearly and if it did not bear so heavily upon the class least able to pay it.

The entire production of molasses and sugar in the Southern States does not amount in value to one-fifth of the amount of the duty paid for its protection, and it certainly cannot be just to pay $40,000,000 annually to protect an interest not worth in the aggregate $8,000,000.

The Government had far better pay to every planter a bonus of five cents upon every pound of sugar and every gallon of molasses produced from his lands than to impose this heavy burden of taxation upon our entire population for all that is imported and used in the country.

If, then, this duty is imposed for revenue, it is wrong, because it is imposed upon one of the prime necessaries of life, and the poor have almost all of it to pay, and if imposed for protection it is equally wrong, for the article protected is not worth in the aggregate one-fifth of the amount paid for its protection. In either view of the subject it is wrong, and I trust the day is not far distant when it shall be removed and these essentials to our every-day's living be supplied at the cheap rates that prevailed before the war and under democratic rule.

I will refer to one more instance of unequal and unjust taxation under our present tariff system, believing that quite sufficient for my purpose.

Why should a duty of 20 per cent. be imposed upon quinine? The bark from which it is made is admitted free of duty; and that is right, since it is not and cannot be grown in this country. It does not come in contact with any American production, and being indispensable to the health and comfort of the people, the law imposes no obstacle to its free entry into our ports. Why, then, impose a duty of one-fifth upon its manufactured product? If for the purpose of raising a revenue, the very object of the law is defeated; for the duty is so high that no one can afford to import quinine, and none being imported no duty is paid into the Treasury. If for protection, and that appears to be the only purpose, then I say that this species of protection is the most iniquitous of all the iniquitous exactions imposed upon the people of the country. The protection is solely and only to enrich two or three manufacturers in the cities of New York and Philadelphia. They are to grow rich at the expense of the suffering and afflicted poor people of the country. The diseases to the treatment of which this article is indispensable abound in those sections of country where the agriculturists and the poorer classes are compelled to live.

The rich may avoid these localities in the sickly season, but the poor must remain and suffer and perhaps die, or pay the tribute of 20 per cent. to swell the fortune of the affluent manufacturer.

It is estimated that 800,000 ounces of quinine are used annually in the country, and 50 cents per ounce at least is added to the cost the consumer pays in consequence of this duty, making in the aggregate at least $400,000 imposed upon the sick and the suffering of the land for the emolument of a few individuals.

The worst feature of this iniquitous imposition is that it brings no benefit to the Treasury, and imposes burdens where our sympathy and support should rather be extended.

These examples, Mr. Speaker, and many others might be furnished of the same nature, show as clearly as the light of day how the public burdens are imposed upon the toiling millions of our inhabitants and reveal the true causes for the wide-spread distress that now prevails in our once prosperous and happy country. Thousands of millions of the most remunerative capital of the country is exempted entirely from taxation of every kind, national, State, or municipal, and the deficiency is made up by increasing the burdens of the poor.

The exemption of Government bonds from taxation was barely justifiable as a war measure to sustain the national credit, but the subsequent legislation by which, after the war was over and the public credit not endangered, the principal and interest of those bonds was made payable in coin only and that coin gold coin, finds no such excuse or justification. It was a gigantic job, perpetrated in the interest of capital, from which the country derived not one dollar of benefit, and the burden of public taxation was increased for generations yet to come.

The depreciated and irredeemable paper currency of the day is made a legal tender for all ordinary business transactions, but the lordly bondholder, who pays no tax upon all his wealth, must be paid in gold, and gold only.

There is one kind of money for the rich and another for the poor man, and the poor man's money is worth 15 per cent. less than the rich man's, but it is counted good enough for him, and he must be content to take that or nothing.

Truly "they bind heavy burdens and grievous to be borne and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers."

Our State banks, however good they may have been, have been taxed out of existence. By our system of national banks double interest is realized upon capital without violation of usury laws, and thus the current rates of interest have been increased to the borrower.

The silver dollar, which was a legal tender to any amount previous to 1873, is now a legal tender only to the amount of $5, and beyond that amount gold only will pay duty upon imports or interest and principal of Government bonds. Millions of acres of the public domain have been recklessly voted away to gigantic railroad corporations, and the public money and credit have been pledged to the support of swindling combinations of speculators and public plunderers. The manufacturing interests of the country have been protected and enriched in utter disregard of every consideration of justice and equity to all other interests; and, in short, the entire tendency of national legislation for the past fifteen years has been to protect and promote the interests of capital and to let poverty and labor take care of themselves. The effect has been to enrich those that were already rich and to impoverish those that were already poor.

The population of our country is rapidly drifting into two distinct and widely separated classes—the independently rich, whose fortunes are rapidly and easily augmented, and the toiling, struggling poor, whose poverty tends as rapidly and certainly to destitution and distress.

Under our own observation princely fortunes have been amassed with a rapidity unknown at any period in our history, and scores of millionaires may be found in every commonwealth of the land; such are the facilities by which the rich become rapidly richer, and at the same time never before in our history were the humbler classes of farmers, mechanics, and laborers so sorely distressed and so rapidly approaching destitution.

What, then, is the remedy by which our loved country may once more be restored to its wonted prosperity? Certainly it is not to be found in a further pursuance of the system which has brought us to our present deplorable condition. It is to be found in a thorough and radical change of the laws by which our material interests are at present controlled. The attention of our law-makers must be directed to the root of the evil.

The middle classes and the poor must be protected in their interests, and when we shall have brought relief to the door of the cottage and lifted the yeomanry of the country from the mire of despair into which they are now so deeply sunken, we shall have laid anew the chief corner-stone of our national prosperity.

> Princes and lords may flourish or may fade;
> A breath can make them as a breath hath made;
> But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
> When once destroy'd can never be supplied.

Remove the burdens from the shoulders of the farmers, the mechanics, and the laboring men and women of the country that are now so unjustly and unequally imposed upon them, and place them where they rightfully belong, upon the capital and property of the country. Remove the tax from fermented liquors and tobacco altogether and reduce the tax upon distilled spirits to fifty cents per gallon at once, as proposed in the Meade bill now before the House. Past experience shows that a larger amount was brought into the Treasury from a tax of fifty cents per gallon than from any other rate. It would remove the temptation to frauds upon the revenue that are now practiced to such an extent as to bring disgrace upon the nation and cause every honest citizen to blush for his country. It would break up the "whisky rings" and all that villainous horde that have plundered the Treasury of millions of the people's money. It would not pay to steal so small an amount and run the risk of detection and exposure.

Reduce this tax to fifty cents, I say, and remove it altogether at the earliest possible period. Abolish the duties upon sugar and quinine and all such articles as are used equally by all classes, and impose duties upon manufactured goods so as to bring revenue into the Treasury and not prohibit their importation entirely. By doing this we will relieve the poor people of the country of a burden of more than a hundred millions annually. We will remove the hinderances that obstruct the prosperity of our agriculture and give a new impulse to every avenue of trade and commerce. In addition to this, let us institute a rigid economy in the management of our public affairs. Stop the stealing by officials in high and responsible positions of the public service and bring the thieves speedily to the bar of public justice to answer for their crimes, and punish them when found guilty.

Already has a democratic House saved $30,000,000 to the people of the country in the appropriations for the expenses of the present year, and a much larger sum would have been saved but for the resistence of a republican Senate.

For the deplorable condition of affairs now existing in the country the misrule of the republican party is entirely responsible.

The means of prosperity for all classes of our citizens abound in the land to a greater extent than ever before. With good rulers at the head of the Government, whose only ambition would be to promote their country's good, we can again be a prosperous and a happy people.

For three-fourths of our national existence and guided by democratic principles the nation was prosperous and the people happy. Under no other method of administration has the country ever fared so well, and the people—the great, mighty, surging masses—are longing again for their former rulers. "Weighed in the balance and found wanting," is the verdict everywhere of the sober minded against the republican party. "Mene, mene, tekel upharsin" is the handwriting plainly visible upon the walls of every Department of the Government, and the knees of our modern political Belshazzar are made to smite the one against the other for very fear of the day of retribution that is now near at hand.

I have faith in the final verdict of the people. The mills of the gods grind slow, but they grind exceeding fine. The popular mind is becoming at last aroused to the realities of our perilous condition and the sources from which our dangers spring, and before the Ides of the coming March I firmly believe that an indignant people will hurl from their high places those who have so long trampled their interests under foot and turned a deaf ear to their cry of distress.

Pennsylvania Border Claims.

SPEECH OF HON. LEVI MAISH,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 12, 1876,

On Pennsylvania border claims.

Mr. MAISH. Mr. Speaker, in the early part of this session I presented to the House a bill (H. R. No. 1640) to re-imburse the State of Pennsylvania for moneys paid to certain of her citizens for losses sustained by invasion during the late war, and also to pay the State certain unpaid claims for such losses now on file in the office of the auditor-general of said State for payment to the claimants.

My friend and colleague [Mr. STENGER] and myself, representing as we do nearly all the counties in which these losses occurred, were anxious to bring this bill to the consideration of Congress at this session. It, however, became apparent that this could not be done. We cherish the hope that Congress at its next session, upon a full and fair discussion of the bill, will recognize the justice of this claim and liquidate it as becomes a great nation; and I have risen merely to call attention to this measure and inform the House that its friends purpose pressing it upon the attention of Congress then with a view of having the question brought to a test.

The State of Pennsylvania has paid $800,000 of these claims, and those that remain unpaid were carefully adjudicated by a commission acting under a law of the State and filed in the office of its auditor-general. And the executive of the State was charged with the duty of making the demand for their payment from the General Government.

Pennsylvania has by her action shown her faith in the justice of these claims and her determination to demand their payment. She will persist in making this demand until the principle upon which they are founded has been fully and fairly settled one way or the other.

It is not my purpose now to enter upon an extended argument. When the proper time arrives, I trust it will be the privilege of myself and colleague, [Mr. STENGER,] as it will be our pleasure, to submit some observations in support of this bill. The preamble pretty fully sets forth the basis on which these claims are founded. Appreciating the dangers of a long line of exposed border, the Legislature of Pennsylvania in May, 1861, provided for the defense of her territory. She organized for that purpose the Pennsylvania Reserve Corps, that splendid body of men which gained so much renown in and shed so much luster upon the Union Army during the late war. This corps, it will hardly be denied, would have protected our citizens against the frequent invasions and depredations made by small bodies of the enemy; and, aided by the large army of emergency troops that rallied to the defense of our State upon a moment's warning, it is my belief that no rebel foot would ever have trod upon the soil of our State. These troops were taken from us by the General Government and mustered into the Union Army. The State had furnished her full quota of men and performed all her obligations to the national Government. Her citizens were true to the Union and peace prevailed among them. When these invasions were made, she received no assistance from the General Government. The State was invaded; her beautiful fields, teeming with fertility year after year, were laid waste. The flourishing town in which my colleague has his home was destroyed by fire and thousands of the citizens of our State were impoverished.

When Pennsylvania entered the Federal Union and gave up her war powers to the General Government, she did so upon the understanding that the latter would afford to her inhabitants protection in time of war or insurrection. This not having been granted her, after she had performed all her obligations to the General Government, it is claimed that she is entitled to indemnity for the losses sustained by her inhabitants, for their use. Under such circumstances, what was sacrificed in the common defense should, it seems to me, be paid out of the common fund.

Reduction of Expenditures During the Four Years Ending June 30, 1876.

SPEECH OF HON. J. A. GARFIELD,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 29, 1876.

The House having under consideration the State of the Union—

Mr. GARFIELD said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In the year 1872, soon after I became chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I made an analysis of the expenditures of the Government from the official records of the Treasury Department, with a view to classifying them in such a manner as to make the various kinds of expenditures easily understood. I divided all the expenditures, exclusive of payments on the principal of the public debt, into three groups. The first embraces all those expenditures that grew directly out of the war. It did not include the very large incidental expenses of the war, such as the increase of the clerical force in nearly all of the Departments, but included only those items about which there could be no doubt that they were occasioned directly by the war itself.

The second group consisted of expenditures for the Army and Navy in time of peace, but did not include those civil expenditures under the control of the War Department for rivers and harbors and similar public works.

The third group consisted of the expenditures for the civil service proper.

This analysis was continued year by year down to and including 1874. It was continued at the present session by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] And now that the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, is closed, I have obtained from the Treasury Department a similar analysis for that year and present it in the following table, which includes the four years 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876; being the four years for which appropriations were made when I was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

It will be remembered that near the close of the last session of the Forty-third Congress I reviewed the appropriations and expenditures up to that time, and expressed the opinion that the work of the four years would show a reduction of at least $30,000,000 in the expenditures of the Government during that period. But the value of any speculative opinion can only be tested by time; and the following table speaks for itself:

Comparative statement of expenditures during the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
July 27, 1876.

SIR: In compliance with your request of the 11th instant, I have the honor to transmit herewith a comparative statement of expenditures during the fiscal years 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876, showing amounts paid on account of expenses growing directly out of the war, expenses of military and naval establishments, and the expenses under head of civil service.

I am, very respectfully,

CHAS. F. CONANT,
Assistant Secretary.

Hon. J. A. GARFIELD,
House of Representatives.

From this official exhibit it will be seen that the expenditures, under the first group, that have grown directly out of the war, have been reduced from $157,250,000 to a little less than $141,000,000; for the Army and Navy proper, from near $54,000,000 to a little more than $47,250,000; for the civil service proper, from $79,000,000 to $70,333,333, and that the aggregate reduction of expenditures during that period of four years is nearly $32,000,000.

It will be seen that 54½ per cent. of all the expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, grew directly out of the war.

When the current fiscal year shall have ended and a similar analysis is made, we can judge precisely the merit of the work of this session. I shall not stint any just praise due to this House for whatever good work it has accomplished in that direction. But much the largest share of reductions that have been made in the bills already passed, and those yet to be acted upon by the House, have been postponements of necessary appropriations, and not an actual mustering out of expenditures. I make this statement for the purpose of doing justice to the work already done, and also of laying the foundation of a just estimate of work done at the present session.

The so-called Sectarian School Amendment.

SPEECH OF HON. EDWIN R. MEADE,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 5, 1876.

The House having under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. MEADE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: At intervals in the history of our country have been observed strongly marked appeals to prejudice, not to say fanaticism, and a recurrence to the more noted of these disclose what the elder Weller would term "a remarkable cowincidence" with the expiring throes of the political organization which for the time being has been in opposition to the democratic party. It may be said, in accordance with a logic which sometimes prevails, that the democratic party must therefore be responsible for these appeals; but whatever may be the sins which that party may have to answer for, it has never entertained or practiced proscription.

It is within the recollection of many upon this floor when a pretended exposé of Freemasonry was made the pretext for an issue which was to sustain the failing fortunes of those opposed to the severe politics of General Jackson. Then every prejudice was endeavored to be aroused to sustain the waning cause, and when all else became weak and vapid, the corpse of Monroe was brought into the market-place as that of the alleged victim of Freemasonry, while the utterance went secretly forth that it was a good enough Morgan until after the election. The sincerity of this movement was finally exemplified in the selection by the anti-masonic party of life-long Freemasons for candidates for the most prominent offices. Again, when the whig party approached its dissolution, were found those willing to conjure up that demon of discord, know-nothingism, though it repudiated the first principles of our Federal organization and the vital elements of the Constitution; and yet though we have beheld its shadow approach the chair now occupied by you, Mr. Speaker, it in its turn was repudiated and finally consigned to the potter's field of political make-shifts.

I do not, therefore, claim that the country was entirely unprepared for the reception of the new issue which is now sought to be thrust upon it. The decline of the same party of opposition after fifteen years of political control should have alone warned us that some new one of the many protean forms of intolerance was to be called into service, and it required but little forecast to perceive at this time a religious hue was to be given to the subject. The success of one of England's prime-ministers in procuring a restoration to power by employing his hours of retirement in producing the gilded romance of Lothair, and the not yet so successful but more conspicuous efforts of another ex-prime minister in presening a political expostulation against the decrees of a great church, were events not likely to be overlooked or wanting imitators under the straitened circumstances of that party which met such ignoble defeat at the November election of 1874. When, where, how this new issue was to be brought forth were questions which remained unsolved until the President of the United States, departing from his rule of reticence, made the occasion of the convention of the Army of the Tennessee at Des Moines in September, 1875, one for the delivery of an apparently carefully prepared speech, having for its evident purpose, to say the least, to provoke a response which would justify its utterance. It is true some faint rumors of the approaching event had been suggested through the columns of an illustrated radical periodical, but nothing having an authoritative or fixed character had appeared until the Des Moines speech, and if the intent was to provoke irritation and opposition, then it was a signal failure, for no audible response was heard throughout the land.

A few extracts from this remarkable effort will suffice. The President says:

> I do not bring into this assemblage politics, certainly not partisan politics, but it is a fair subject for the soldiers in their deliberations to consider what may be necessary to secure the prize for which they battled.

Then again:

> If we are to have another contest in the near future of our national existence, I predict that the dividing line will not be Mason and Dixon's, but between patriotism and intelligence on the one side and superstition, ambition, and ignorance on the other.

And still further on we have:

> Encourage free schools, and resolve that not one dollar appropriated for their support shall be appropriated for the support of any sectarian schools.

I need not quote more extensively from this remarkable production, which is so familiar to every reader of general literature in this country; but, from what has been already submitted, who is so blind as not to perceive that this language was deliberately and willfully prepared to incite rancor and hatred in the breasts of our fellow-citizens; that the wish must have been father to the thought, whose expression intended an incitement, having for its immediate object to influence the Ohio election which was then impending?

Now, in view of the fact that the election in Ohio in 1875 was carried, as is generally understood, by reason of the unfair introduction there of what has been termed "the school question," it is refreshing to peruse from a letter bearing date Augusta, Maine, October 20, 1875, written it is said to a prominent Ohio gentleman:

> MY DEAR SIR: The public-school agitation in your late campaign is likely to break out elsewhere, and occurring first in one State and then in another, may keep the whole country in a ferment for years to come. This inevitably arouses sectarian feeling and leads to that bitterest and most deplorable of all strifes, the strife between religious denominations. It seems to me that this question ought to be settled in some definite and comprehensive way, and the only settlement which can be final is the complete victory for non-sectarian schools. I am sure this will be demanded by the American people at all hazards and at any cost.

The writer concludes his somewhat lengthy letter by proposing the amendment later in the same year offered in this House, and says:

> This, you will observe, does not interfere with any State having just such a school system as its citizens may prefer, subject to the single and simple restriction that the schools shall not be made the arena for sectarian controversy or theological disputation. This adjustment, it seems to me, would be comprehensive and conclusive, and would be fair alike to Protestant and Catholic, to Jew and Gentile, leaving the religious faith and the conscience of every man free and unmolested.

I should have added that the author of this letter is the distinguished gentleman from Maine lately a member of this House, and who I have no doubt has had great influence in molding public opinion on the subject. Anything from that gentleman always receives attention, and nothing ever uttered by him was so gently persuasive as the foregoing. One susceptible youth in particular was moved by it, who also wrote a letter, which met with the peculiar fate of getting into wrong hands, and so found its way into the papers, and it contains an earnest invitation to the writer of the above to join a secret anti-sectarian order, "which will no doubt exert a potent political influence in the next presidential election." It is so richly suggestive that I quote it entire, as published in the Augusta Standard of December 10, 1875:

> OFFICE OF EVENING COURIER,
> Newark, New Jersey, November 9, 1875.
> MY DEAR SIR: Eighteen months ago I told you that you could have New Jersey in 1876. I wish now to emphasize that statement. All our people are for you, and we can carry the State beyond peradventure.
> Our danger is that the West will demand the nomination. This can be averted, of course, by a union of New England, the Middle States, and stray votes from the South. A potent factor in our next convention will be the secret anti-Catholic order. Grant is a member, and it has a good deal of strength in Congress. I think you ought to go in. It can be arranged so that you can be initiated anywhere by one person. The order is spreading widely. My obligations do not permit me to say more than this, except that Grant no doubt relies upon it to promote his aims.
> With wisdom at Washington and in the States we have carried we can surely hold the country. But to hold it for a hap-hazard candidate is hardly worth the candle. For one of a vast multitude I want to hold it for you. Excuse this screed, and believe me, yours, very truly,
> JNO. Y. FOSTER.
> Hon. J. G. BLAINE.

The concluding paragraph, while not exactly germane to the subject under consideration, indicates the tendency to prophetic vision in the writer.

Foster, it is true, has not been summoned before any committee of this body to explain how this letter became public, but when we shall have obtained general legislative jurisdiction of the subject-matter, he will doubtless then be relieved for a time from the arduous duties of clerk of the New Jersey Assembly, that "he may rise and explain." "That Grant belongs to the same secret anti-Catholic society" and that "it has a good deal of strength in Congress" are statements that ought to have settled things down in Maine if the introduction of the constitutional amendment had not already been decided on. In his annual message to this body in December last the President, if we are to believe Mr. Foster, carried out his obligation to the secret society of which he is a member by proposing a constitutional amendment respecting schools, and the further suggestion, lest there should be any want of inflammability in the first, providing for the taxation of church property.

I have not recently heard much concerning this latter provision, because, as I am informed, it re-acted, like a boomerang, where least expected. But the gentleman from Maine did, on one of the first days of this session, introduce as an amendment to the Constitution a joint resolution, as follows:

> No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; and no money raised by taxation in any State for the support of public schools, or derived from any public fund therefor, nor any public lands devoted thereto, shall ever be under the control of any religious sect; nor shall any money so raised or lands so devoted be divided between religious sects or denominations.

The Cincinnati platform and the letter of the presidential nominee of the opposition party completes the history of this new movement which is sought to be developed into an aggressive element of the coming political campaign.

I will not attempt criticism on this proposed law which has been shorn of its more objectionable features by the wise addition by the Judiciary Committee of a provision which will hereafter preclude Federal interference except as may be necessary by the Supreme Court to compel an obedience of this new law. Whether its author intended a race for popularity with the oracle of Des Moines I do not undertake to say, and how far such rivalry or such devotion would be appreciated by the sect or denomination most likely to be recognized I am also unable to state. But from the perusal of the foregoing political and rhetorical offering the inquiry naturally arises, why this sudden cause or pretense of alarm? Is this remarkable action because any one denomination is becoming numerically so much stronger than the rest? Has any denomination or sect attempted interference with our political institutions, and is it by reason of its numbers likely to prove politically formidable or dangerous? Surmising as I do who may have been aimed at, I have made the following compilation from the census of 1870 as showing the membership of the various denominations in this country; and certainly no occasion for alarm is observed in this exhibit:

Denominations.	Edifices.	Sittings.
Baptist	12,857	3,997,116
Congregational	2,715	1,117,212
Episcopal	2,601	992,051
Friends	663	224,664
Jewish	152	73,965
Presbyterian, (regular)	5,653	2,198,900
Roman Catholic	3,806	1,990,514
Methodist	21,337	6,528,209

The historical and incidental account which I have rendered of the growth of this new idea or movement sufficiently explains to my mind its real purposes, which now by the action of the Cincinnati convention are sought to be made a leading political issue. As a rule our people are more devotedly attached to our public-school system than to any other of our numerous political institutions. It is that esteem, that love which is appealed to, while the real object of attack is held up to divert the urgent inquiry which exists in the public mind concerning the late administration of governmental affairs; but I little understand the sentiment of this country if this deception will be allowed to succeed and if all such efforts will not prove abortive. The real danger which exists toward our public schools is not from religious opposition, but from partisan political interference. Nearly all our States have at the present time school laws with which their citizens are not only satisfied but of which they are justly proud, and any interference with them on the part of the Federal Government would be indeed revolting; and I can scarcely believe that a greater insult could be conveyed to the sense of independence and self-government which animates our people than to have our school systems placed under the control of the Federal Government and a host of hungry and ignorant officials who "though gorged to the throat are lean and ravenous still." Nor is it sufficient to say that the adoption of any amendment in the constitutional mode prescribed ought to be satisfactory. A covert attack upon any religious denomination is in conflict with one of the articles of the Constitution itself, and as having reference to the school subject, it is such an interference, and uncalled for, too, with the local affairs of the State as to be contrary to and in violation of the spirit of the original compact. That compact was made with special reference to subjects here involved. Without the reservation to States which that instrument permitted, it would have failed in instances to secure ratification. The circumstances in this respect have not since changed, and it would ill become a majority approaching even unanimity to force upon a single State so obnoxious a provision because the constitutional power exists to do so.

The school laws which govern my own State, and especially the city in which I reside, have been the growth of many years and of careful and matured consideration of our wisest citizens, and while defects in them there may be, yet we have reason to feel a just pride in consequence of the system which has resulted; and I venture to say that it has never occurred to any considerable number of our citizens either before or since the remarkable manifestation at Des Moines that it was necessary for us to call in the aid of the Federal Government to sustain us in maintaining our schools, and I have yet to hear the first appeal of responsible origin in my State to the Federal Government for its protection. Its laws respecting its common-school system require no defense here, but lest any one may have imbibed an erroneous impression respecting them and the application of moneys thereto, I take the liberty of reading from the statutes of New York section 18 of the law governing the board of education of our city. It reads as follows:

> No school shall be entitled to or receive any portion of the school moneys in which the religious doctrine or tenets of any particular Christian or other religious sect shall be taught, inculcated, or practiced, or in which any book or books containing compositions favorable or prejudicial to the particular doctrines or tenets of any particular Christian or other religious sect, or which shall refuse to permit the visits or examinations provided for in this act. But nothing herein contained shall authorize the board of education to exclude the Holy Scriptures, without note or comment, or any selections therefrom, from any of the schools provided for by this act; but it shall not be competent for the said board of education to decide what version, if any, of the Holy Scriptures, without note or comment, shall be used in any of the schools: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to violate the rights of conscience as secured by the constitution of this State and of the United States.

It may have occurred to the casuist that this law, as liberal as it was undoubtedly intended to be by its framers, contains material defects; but I presume that the mover of the proposed amendment to the Constitution will not complain on account of them, and, whether or no, I feel safe in saying that the people of the State of New York are amply able to deal with this question whenever it is presented to them. From the necessity of the case it would seem that in framing a general school law some injustice must be done to those who regard religious education to be a necessary and material element in the common-school education of the country, and I have all along believed that the time would come when even this appearance of injustice might be obviated, and when all denominations and all beliefs might stand on an equal footing respecting the application of the common-school fund. It may be a matter of years or of a century, but it is inevitable, in my mind, that in the development of education in this country, which brings all men to a common mind, the obvious injustice of discrimination against any of our tax-paying citizens who may choose to have different or peculiar ideas respecting religious education in schools will be in a great degree and substantially mitigated; but I desire to add here that I have no connection with any denomination which justifies me in speaking for it, and I have only aimed to treat the subject in its general aspects and as I feel the injustice of Federal interference in matters which to my mind are purely of individual conscience or State concern.

As before remarked, the amendment as modified is far less objectionable than in its original form. I deprecate, however, any action on the religious-school question here, but I shall in this instance surrender my personal views and give in my adherence in the hope that we may, by adopting this amendment, remove the pretense for an unseemly agitation; for while the subject is one which does not properly belong to the arena of partisan politics, so I would submit to this amendment that we may avoid its introduction there. When deprived of its necessary stimulant of opposition the vitality of this new movement will cease, the intolerant spirit which now animates it will depart, and it will take its place in history along with witchcraft and other evidences in times past of a crack in the public cranium, and in our later times of the approaching dissolution of the enemies of democracy.

The Causes of Discrimination in the Transmission of our Products.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES WILSON,

OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 4, 1876.

On the causes of discrimination in the transmission of our products.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to our transportation interests that have been too much neglected by Congress, and to a particular feature, the existence of which has been long suspected, but not heretofore brought to light, mainly because Congress has been slow to take up the subject of transportation in any of its relations, and no less authority than the national Legislature could bring out the facts as they relate to interstate commerce. It has long been suspected that the evils connected with transportation have grown out of discriminations against our different industries in the interest of favored individuals inside and outside of the railway companies, and, while many industries suffer, no increased benefit in consequence of such discrimination results to the stockholder.

I must also observe that the reluctance which many eastern Representatives have to congressional action on this subject should be overcome, if it can be shown that not only the patron of the railroad is being robbed and ruined, but the owner as well, and that in most cases where complaint is heard the cause is brought about in the interest of special shippers. While the evils existed principally in the West, it was difficult to obtain a patient hearing. The eastern members reflected that his constituents furnished the money to build the roads, and the ungrateful West that had derived all the benefit forthwith set about confiscating the property. Western fields are rich and western men do not count closely. Railroads might make successive construction companies and boards of directors and their favorites wealthy and nobody in the Mississippi Valley go hungry or barefooted. It has so far been beyond the ingenuity of monopolists to stop the growth of our Northwestern States or check the ambition of their citizens. But such is not the case with regard to interests farther East, where great industrial interests, that work on close margins and give employment to many thousands of workmen, are prostrated by discriminations against them, their capital made worthless and distress attending employer and employé. I surely do not need to apologize to any one in this day of the universal prostration of our industries for calling the attention of the House to this evil and urging the adoption of remedies before adjournment.

This is a time when every facility should be extended that it is in the power of Congress to extend, not only to enable many men to prosper but to exist, and if we would contribute what is our duty and in our power to give—legislation that shall protect where we only can protect, in order that the distinguishing features of American society may be preserved—it is high time the subject be vigorously handled and the means of comfortable living that our land affords to all its children be not unduly taxed by grasping men, resulting in two classes of society that are the weakness and bane of every country burdened with them, the very poor and the very rich.

During the past ten years or since the enormous increase of money created by the late war permitted and led to the consolidation of large numbers of the railroads of the country into a few lines of unwieldy length and of enormous capitals, the people of various localities throughout the whole breadth of the land have been petitioning their respective Legislatures and the Congress of the United States for protection against the exactions and impositions of these roads. It would seem to be an incontrovertible fact that the prosperity and welfare of the people living on and using these several lines are inseparably connected with that of the railways. Yet the bitterest complaints come from these people, and their complaints and grievances, when analyzed and compared, lead to but one conclusion, either that the race of transportation men has run into imbecility or that there is no quarrel between the people of any section and the railroads per se, but that the private interests which control the policy of the railroads are the disturbing elements and the cause of the corporate actions of which the people complain. When and wherever the bottom facts have been reached the last state of affairs has invariably been found to exist, and to this fact is to be attributed the bitter opposition which any measure in State or national Legislatures looking to a correcting of the evil meets with in the name and by the power of the corporations complained of. The complaints seem not confined to locality or trade. The cry comes up from the grain-growing districts equally with the cattle, the lumber, the coal, the iron, the oil, and the manufacturing districts. The State Legislatures have in most instances listened and legislated so as to protect their people so far as State lines and laws could protect, but the interchange of commodities extends over all the States; the railroads each extend over several States, one corporation—it is in evidence before a committee of this House—extends over eleven States and controls a line of six thousand miles in length. The State law controlling a shipment is inoperative to further protect that shipment after it crosses its State line, and State laws cannot be relied upon to secure equity in interstate commerce, because they are wholly inoperative outside of the State, and as nearly all commerce is interstate it owes obedience to no law, as Congress has failed to enact any.

For this reason Congress has been frequently petitioned to exercise the power conferred by the Constitution to enact a law which should regulate the commerce between the States. The Supreme Court of the United States has so frequently passed upon this constitutional provision that the authority of Congress would now seem to be a matter beyond argument; but so far Congress has failed to act upon the petitions presented beyond the reference of bills to a committee or the ordering of an investigation, upon neither of which was a report ever yet made, except one bill in the last Congress.

At this session the petitioners are again at our doors, the usual reference of bills has been made, the usual investigation ordered, and the usual non-action has resulted so far as this House is formally advised.

Hereinbefore it has been asserted that the private interests of those within the charmed circle of railway management have controlled the policy and action of the railways regardless of the injury and ruin it imposed upon all outside. If this be so, it is simple justice to the people, to the railway owners, and to Congress that it should be fully made known and legislated against. The most strongly marked and conclusive exhibition of this fact is displayed in the evidence now before a committee of this House, having this question under investigation. It is in evidence that the five leading railroads of this country entered into a formal contract with a combination of less than a dozen men residing in various cities securing to these men the monopoly of the petroleum trade. Not one of them lived in the oil-producing region nor owned property there, yet those contracts formally provide that the men who produced and owned this immense product, the third in magnitude and value of our country's exports, should not be permitted to transport it over these roads.

These contracts—not mere agreements, but solemn contracts, duly executed, with the corporate seals of the railways attached—provided, not in cunningly drawn legal phrases, but in good, clear English, that the railways should use their power to overcome all competition to these men. The provision therein which I refer to reads as follows:

> And it is hereby further covenanted and agreed by and between the parties hereto that the party hereto of the second part (the railroads) shall at all times cooperate as far as it legally may with the party hereto of the first part to maintain the business of the party hereto of the first part against loss or injury by competition, to the end that the party hereto of the first part may keep up a remunerative and so a full and regular business, and to that end shall lower or raise the gross rates of transportation over its railroads and connections as far as it legally may for such times and to such extent as may be necessary to overcome such competition.

Under this scheme the least possible yearly profit would be over $6,000,000, without a dollar of investment by the parties. Six millions of dollars taken each year from either producer or consumer, and for what and for whom? Certainly we are not to believe that railway officials could not see that that was too much money to divide yearly among less than a dozen men. That such contracts were ever entered into was infamous; that they were committed to paper is astounding.

The people of the oil regions unearthed those contracts, secret as they were, and have produced them here, and by them they accounted for their difficulties and justified their complaints. If such contracts existed controlling that product, what contracts control the coal, the iron, the lumber, the grain, or the cattle traffic, which interests are loud in their complaints?

Congress in May last ordered an investigation of these matters. The railway contracts and agreements known to exist were called for by the committee, and the officers controlling them, some of whom, in the evidence, are alleged to be personally interested therein, were subpœnaed nearly two months since. Only one of them has appeared before the committee and not a document called for by subpœna has been produced. When before, in the history of the American Congress, did men feel strong enough to disobey its mandate with impunity and to defy its authority? Yet the committee makes no complaint; it does not invoke the strong arm of the House to vindicate its dignity; it passes over this unprecedented defiance in utter silence. Other parties implicated were subpœnaed, and again but one appeared, Mr. Payne, treasurer of the Standard Oil Company of Cleveland, it being the head and front of the alleged conspiracy.

The testimony showed the almost complete annihilation of the refining interests from the lakes to Virginia outside of this organization. He admitted that his company had been successful, had made money, had absorbed or driven out competition; but as to its arrangements with railways, by which it was enabled to accomplish this end, (just as provided for in the contracts before referred to,) he was as prompt as was the railway witness in refusing to answer or to produce the papers he was subpœnaed to bring; yet the committee do not complain to us of this, though this man certainly is not a railway official.

It seems incomprehensible to me how this House can claim to be consistent in its conduct. We have not hesitated to bring to our bar every contumacious witness who refused to testify concerning the most insignificant matter before any committee of the House, and on refusal to answer promptly send him to jail. But when a subject second to none in general interest is being inquired into by order of the House gentlemen hesitate and refuse to do their duty. A railroad man can defy the American House of Representatives, and the publication of the fact seems to create no indignation. The enormous profits of a few favored men are to continue, and thousands of our fellow-citizens are thrown out of employment, while we look for the cause in a bad policy controlling our currency or attribute our industrial distress to an inscrutable Providence.

How valiantly we charge down upon an uninfluential private citizen who presumes to deny to us the right to drag to public gaze his private business. How very thorough we are in our investigations, sometimes even capturing by the hundred-weight the private telegrams of whoever may have used the wires to conduct his private business.

What a rare opportunity was offered the Committee on Commerce to perform a high public duty intrusted to them by the House, when the high officials of the railways refused to either testify respecting the discriminations they had been instrumental in bringing about or obey the subpœna duces tecum issued by the Speaker at the request of the committee.

Some men make opportunities, others have them thrust upon them, while my observation in Congress is that opportunities to conserve the public good are too rare to satisfy the desire of the member to be useful. But, rare as this opportunity to aid in the solution of the transportation problem and prevent the annihilation of our industries in this day of industrial prostration was, the Committee on Commerce let it pass; discrimination goes on, favored shippers continue to reap unusual gains, and the railway owners suffer and depression of our industries continues.

A railway director, alleged in the evidence to be in this combination, personally sits unsubpœnaed in the committee-room during its investigation. Railway counsel appear to deny the committee's power and authority. Railway presidents, directors, and minor officials have seats upon this floor. But it is not possible that we or any of us are in any other service while here than in that of the people of these United States. It is not possible that a railway official, alleged to be betraying the interest intrusted to him and ruining the people on its line, who are its patrons, and this for his own personal benefit, has a right to defy the authority of this House as these men have done.

In some sections of our country the public prints are filled with complaints of ruined trade, with charges against railway officials by name; that they accumulate large fortunes on small salaries; that they procure drawbacks for favored individuals and divide them with the recipients; that they are secretly engaged in mining, manufacturing, and trade, of which their roads are the transporters, and to the exclusion of all other individuals.

I appeal to this House to listen to these petitioners. They have a right here; they ask nothing which takes one dollar from any railway, its stock or bond holders. They do not ask us to fix prices or to restrict them, but that there shall be no discriminations, that all at any given place shall be put on an equality in transportation, so that he that ships a car-load one hundred miles shall not be made to pay more for its transportation than he that ships a car-load one thousand miles. No legitimate railway interest is harmed by the legislation asked for; it does not prohibit either competition or agreement as to prices. On the contrary, in case of such agreement, it will compel each road to adhere to it; and when railways and their managers are compelled to confine themselves to their legitimate business of transporting the products of the country, self-interest will to some extent prohibit them from imposing any charge that the products will not bear.

From many quarters comes to us the cry of distress, of idle men and depressed industries. How much of this is due to the injustice and selfishness of the transportation men of the country, instead of being attributable to currency or other questions, is well worthy of the attention of this Congress; but let it at the outset assert its right to examine and ascertain, and its power to enforce its right.

It may be thought that I am going out of my way for a subject. But there is an intimate and close relation between an Iowa farmer and an eastern manufacturer that is not equaled by the interests that are common to members of the same household. Nay, more; Iowa farmers, in many respects, are rivals in production of the staples of agriculture, and one may for some reason, and from some cause, become bankrupt, and his neighbor is not injured at all; but stop an eastern manufactory, throw thousands of workmen out of employment, and you curtail their power to buy the bread and meat produced by the Iowa farmer. Stop the oil-refinery at Pittsburgh by such discrimination in freights that the crude oil can be taken to Cleveland, Ohio, to be refined, and the power of the workmen in Pittsburgh to buy western beef and wheat is stopped, perhaps, altogether, and he and his family must live on the coarser foods that are raised in the West, it is true, but not with any profit.

I do not see how this House can be excused from acting on this subject. The report of the testimony has appeared every day in the daily papers of the country. I suppose that is the reason we do not have a formal report. The old custom of waiting for a committee to report before alluding to what occurred in the committee has become obsolete in this Congress. I am perhaps the last member of the House to break over the rule. But when I find the testimony taken in a committee in the hands of parties in no way connected with Congress, my scruples vanish.

It is sad to contemplate the prostrate interests of the country caused by the unlawful gains of the few. That half a dozen railroad managers may grow rich, a community must suffer. That a few favored men's families may be surrounded with luxuries more than mortal needs, distress may spread over a country-side of industrious people. That riotous plenty may pamper the beneficiaries of special rates, want, nakedness, hunger, poverty, and despair are but too common in the household of too many of our fellow-citizens.

Resumption of Specie Payments.

SPEECH OF HON. G. L. FORT,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 5, 1876,

On the bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency to repeal in part the resumption act of 1875; and also a joint resolution reported by said committee to appoint a certain commission therein named.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, eight months of the session have passed, and just as we are about to adjourn the Committee on Banking and Currency brings in two bills, which its witty chairman [Mr. COX] says are twin measures. One "to repeal a portion of the resumption clause of the act of January 14, 1875," and the other to appoint a commission to inquire "into the relative value of gold and silver" and "into the policy and best means of providing for the resumption of specie payments." And, sir, I suppose one is a soft-money twin and the other is a hard-money twin, and it may be safe to presume their parentage to be the Saint Louis nominees. The one repeals the resumption day fixed for 1879 and the other inquires of the wise men of the East what day the golden star may be seen.

The one may be interpreted to contractionists to mean immediate specie resumption and the other may be explained to greenbackers to mean perpetual paper money. And all this we are told by the other side of the House is in harmony with the Saint Louis platform. And no doubt in this they confess the truth. The Saint Louis platform, the Saint Louis nominees, and these twin measures are all harmonious. The platform has a hard-money plank with soft-money construction; the ticket, hard-money head, with soft-money tail. These twin bills mean immediate contraction or greenbacks forever. Whichever you prefer they promise you shall have. Nothing but shining gold immediately or greenbacks now and always.

What do gentlemen intend, Mr. Speaker? For one, I desire to be advised. Do they intend to repeal the resumption clause of the act of 1875 or do they intend only to strike out the day fixed, so that they may force resumption by contraction before 1879 or they may not attempt it even then, perhaps never. Mr. Speaker, I ask gentlemen to read the law as it will stand if this bill becomes a law, and tell me if it will not be susceptible of double construction. I see before me the honorable gentlemen from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] chairman of the national democratic committee, who so often speaks and who exhibits so much interest in these proceedings, and who is so watchful of one of these bantlings, and who is understood to speak for the head of the Saint Louis ticket. And I also see before me the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] who so carefully nurses the other of these bantlings and who is understood to speak for the tail of the Saint Louis ticket. Both of these gentlemen are democrats, not altogether harmonious on currency questions it is true, yet each supporting Mr. Tilden and Mr. Hendricks on the same ticket. It would be interesting to hear either or both these gentlemen explain and tell us what is intended by that side of the House as to these measures. I will gladly yield to these gentlemen if they, or either of them, will favor the House with their views. But judging from what they have each said and done heretofore in this House, their exposition of the true intent and meaning of these measures would not be very harmonious or satisfactory to each other, and might let the double-headed cat out of the political bag. So we may not have the benefit of the hard and the soft construction of these measures.

The democratic party by the Saint Louis platform declares that the resumption act of 1875 has hindered and obstructed a return to specie payment. That act fixed January 1, 1879, as the day of resumption. And now the democratic party in this House declare that the day named in said act shall be stricken out, and leave all of the remainder of the resumption clause as it is and I now ask them whether they do not thus declare by their platform and by this bill that if they attain power they will resume specie payment by contraction at once. Or do they mean to repeal the day fixed and never resume? The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] says they will resume if they elect Tilden; and I presume the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] will say they will postpone if they elect their ticket. But, sir, the people in my judgment will not permit the democratic party to elect, resume, or postpone. They will still commit the currency question to the republican party.

That party drove out and banished, I trust forever, the old wildcat paper money, and issued and enforced the circulation of the greenback currency, notwithstanding the opposition of Tilden and Hendricks and their friends, and, as I am told, against the loud and frequent protests of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and against the protest of the chairman of the national democratic committee, [Mr. HEWITT,] who could see nothing but ruin in this unconstitutional paper cheat and fraud as he called it at the time. The republican party can take care of it, and in due time redeem it, which will be as soon as it can be done consistently with the public welfare, and not sooner or later.

Mr. Speaker, the only road to resumption lies through the fields of industry and by the way of economy; by it alone we can reach prosperity, where specie payment awaits us.

In traveling this road we should lose no steps nor make any forced marches or be deluded by any false guides. It is no pleasure trip, no idler's way. We must toil day by day until we reach the desired result. We cannot coin a dollar in gold or silver by virtue of an act of Congress alone. We must work and earn it and dollar by dollar pay all our debts.

Mr. Speaker, it matters but little whether we vote for this bill or not. It means but little, and that little is in doubt. It cannot reach the Senate in time to be considered there this session, and perhaps it is not intended by its authors that it should. It is mere empty form, by which it is hoped, I presume, to win some favor for the democratic party. If it were a bill to repeal the resumption portion of the act of 1875, expressed in language that could not be misunderstood or misconstrued, members could vote without doubt.

Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago while the honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] was addressing the House on this bill and on the Saint Louis platform, I asked him to give us the democratic plan for a return to specie payment. And he in answer made use of this language, as near as I can state it, and if I misquote him I beg him to correct me. He said:

> The platform of the democratic party and the letter of acceptance of the democratic candidate for the Presidency set forth this fact, that there can be no resumption without date or with date unless the democratic administration which is to come into power reverses the action of the past administration, unless it inaugurates reform and retrenchment and economy; unless, instead of corruptly spending the people's money and dissipating the revenues of the Government, you make purity, integrity, and economy the principles of official action. That you have failed to do, and we promise to do it.

Sir, this opens a very wide field and invites a review of the present administration.

And, Mr. Speaker, the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE,] a few minutes before, in speaking to this bill and for the democratic party, stated that—

> The road to resumption lies in the correction of governmental abuses, in the reduction of governmental expenses, in the practice of honest simplicity and economy in public as well as in private life.

And again he said:

> If we will practice the old-fashioned virtues of our sires, the day of resumption would not be far off.

This implies that, in his opinion, we do not practice economy and are not as virtuous as our sires were. I understand these gentlemen to mean that the republican Administration and republican party are dishonest, extravagant, and corrupt. I have understood before that some of the reconstructed gentlemen on that side of the House had expressed a purpose to investigate Mr. Lincoln's administration, and that if Mr. Tilden should be elected they would do it. They claim that the war could have been carried on at half the cost it was. What next may we expect? These same gentlemen abuse the republican party for extravagance, and to make good the charge they often tell us from that side of the House that the annual expenses of the Government under democratic administrations were only two or three dollars per capita per annum, whereas they are now four or five times as much.

Mr. Speaker, could not some of these same gentlemen tell us the reason why this may be so? Ay, sir, the country has a sad and sorrowful remembrance of the reason. The owners of more than two thousand millions of our bonds tell us the reason semi-annually. Pensioners who draw annuities of over thirty millions do not let us forget the reason. And, sir, the moan of constantly bereaved ones remind us of the reason why the annual expenses of a republican administration are so great. Only a week or two ago a gentleman on that side of the House who had spent four years in trying to destroy the Republic, with great vehemence denounced the administration of President Grant because its expenses, as he stated, were two hundred and seventy millions a year, while he said Mr. Buchanan's was but eighty millions.

I suppose, of course, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen do not suppose the people are fools, yet they can make these extraordinary statements for no other purpose than to affect the public mind. Sir, a very few moments of calm and unprejudiced reflection will bring every intelligent mind to the conclusion that if you deduct all the expenses of General Grant's administration consequent upon and fairly chargeable to the war account and deduct the amount annually paid to reduce the national debt, you will find the other expenses of the Government are no greater than they were under Mr. Buchanan's. Sir, this is a simple matter of subtraction and addition. Figures will not lie. Sir, do gentlemen invite our attention to the last democratic administration as a model of economy; would they reform by returning to the like of its policy? Sir, I well remember that when I came to the last Congress the first vote I gave here was for an act to pay a debt of $20,000,000 borrowed by Mr. Buchanan's administration to carry on the civil service of the Government. Sir, it will also be remembered that Mr. Buchanan's administration expended all its revenues and all this twenty millions, and Mr. Lincoln found the Treasury bankrupt.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE,] swelling as if about to utter something ponderous, quoted what he called expressive language of Mr. Tilden, "Live within your means." I have just shown that the last democratic President did not live within his income by twenty millions, and if any gentleman questions this, I will refer him to the record right now.

Now, sir, how is it with the republican administration of General Grant?

The receipts into the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, were from—

Customs	$148,071,984 61
Internal revenue	116,700,732 03
Sales public lands	1,129,466 95
Direct tax	93,798 80
Miscellaneous	21,486,056 77
Total net receipts	287,482,039 16

The expenditures were—

Civil	$66,958,373 78
War	38,070,888 64

Now, sir, to whom should this "expressive language" of Mr. Tilden be addressed? Judging from the past, whom should we trust? Should it be that party which when last trusted squandered all the revenues and plunged the country into debt, and a large part of which then rebelled because the people would not consent that they should spread slavery everywhere?

Ay, sir, the history of the democratic party for the last twenty years is not pleasing to either the economist or the patriot, and inspires no confidence or pride in the heart of any lover of his country.

Mr. Speaker, let us inquire carefully how much this republican administration reduced the expenditures for the last fiscal year below the preceding year.

	1876.	1875.
Civil	$66,958,374	$71,070,703
War	38,070,889	41,120,646
Navy	18,963,309	21,497,626

Interest on public debt	100,243,271	103,093,541
Total	258,459,797	274,623,392
		258,459,797
Reduction last year		16,163,595

And, sir, let us pursue the inquiry a little further and see how steadily and how considerably the expenditures of the Government have been reduced from year to year by the help of a republican Congress under and during the entire administration of President Grant. The expenditures of the last eight years were, for—

1869	$322,865,278	1873	$290,345,245
1870	309,653,561	1874	287,133,873
1871	292,177,188	1875	274,623,393
1872	277,517,963	1876	258,459,797

The figures show a net saving in the reduction of annual expenditures during President Grant's administration of $63,405,481, an average annual reduction in the net ordinary expenditures of the Government of over $9,000,000, and during all of which time under General Grant there has been a regular annual reduction in the public debt.

On March 1, 1869, the principal of the public debt was $2,525,463,260, and on August 1, 1876, it was $2,098,301,311, showing a reduction of $427,161,949. The average annual reduction in the principal of the public debt during President Grant's seven years in office has been over $60,000,000, and the decrease in the annual interest charge during the same period is $31,285,281.

With the exhibit made by the foregoing official figures, the people cannot be deceived by the transparent pretensions of reform in expenditures set up by the democratic party.

Mr. Speaker, political pharisees call on all men to behold how holy they are, and point to others and exclaim how corrupt, how dishonest, and how extravagant are these breakers of the law. Sir, it is indeed suggestive to observe how unfortunate these self-styled virtuous individuals are. They so often get into trouble. They are so often detected, and have the cloak of hypocrisy stripped off of them and are subjected to shame. No matter in what party you find them it is always safe to watch them. Honesty, economy, and reform was the constant song of Tweed.

Mr. Speaker, we have had some dishonesty and some extravagance in the republican party. Too much, because any is too much. Bad men creep into its organization and sometimes attain official place, all of which is to be regretted but cannot be avoided. So it is with every organization of men. So it happens with churches, but because of it we do not condemn the whole church.

No government has ever been entirely free from bad men; and no Administration of our own Government has entirely escaped them, from and including Washington down to this day. We should hide no sin, we should let no crime go unpunished. "Let no guilty man escape" is the penal law of the republican party. Let the record of that party be read and judged in this regard by a candid world. Its financial transactions have been enormous. Its responsibilities have been tremendous. Its achievements have been costly, but they are priceless. Its triumphs were difficult yet were glorious. And let every unprejudiced man answer who or what party could have done better or as well. Sir, the charge of dishonesty and corruption against the republican party is untrue and entirely unfounded. This Administration may be contrasted with that of any that has preceded, and it will appear well.

Sir, I have no word of complaint or of disparagement to utter against any of the early Presidents or their administrations. I believe they were honest and as economical as they could make them; yet they had much bad luck and greater loss in the collection and disbursements of their revenues by corrupt and extravagant men than we have to-day. And if history is true, Washington, Jefferson, and the other early Presidents were abused and defamed as much as is that great soldier and statesman who is President now.

I have here, sir, the financial record of all the Administrations, beginning with Washington, showing amounts collected and disbursed, with the amount lost under each Administration by way of defalcation and dishonesty and the percentage lost on each thousand dollars; and it is with extreme caution I give the figures, which can be verified by the old records themselves, to be found at the Treasury Department, all of which are official, and by which it appears that the democratic party have been extremely unfortunate in handling the public money, and by which it will on the other hand appear that the republican party have been indeed extremely fortunate in the same business, and by which it appears that General Grant has been as successful in keeping thieves out of the Treasury as he was in keeping armed traitors out of this capital.

Not long since my colleague, distinguished for service in the field and on this floor, [Mr. HURLBUT,] in an able speech used tabulated matter which strikingly exhibited in favorable light the republican Administrations. I desire, however, Mr. Speaker, to go back to the beginning of the Government, and will necessarily have to pass over the ground previously occupied by my esteemed colleague, and will show the same result he did in a different form, proving the correctness of his figures and of mine; and I respectfully challenge the other side of the House to point out wherein they are wrong.

I give you the statement showing the receipts and disbursements of the Government from its organization to June 30, 1875; exhibiting the ratio of losses per $1,000 to the aggregate received and disbursed and amount involved, arranged as nearly as practicable in periods of Administrations, and also in the periods prior and subsequent to June 30, 1861, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury:

Let us look into these tables and see whether the good old democratic days were purer than these days.

In Martin Van Buren's time corruption seems to have reached its height. The losses during his administration of four years were $3,343,792.04, or a loss of $11.71 on each $1,000. The preceding administration (Jackson's) in eight years had lost $3,761,111.87, or over $400,000 more; but as the amount of receipts and disbursements were larger the ratio of loss on each $1,000 was somewhat smaller, being $7.52 on each $1,000.

John Tyler succeeded Van Buren, and the losses during his administration were $1,565,903.25, or less than half of the amount lost by his predecessor; the ratio of loss being $6.40 on $1,000. Polk followed, with a loss of $4.08 on each $1,000. Pierce lost over $2,000,000, or $3.56 on each $1,000. And the last democratic administration (Buchanan) lost $500,000 more than Pierce, and raised the ratio of loss on the $1,000 to $3.81.

March 4, 1861, the democrats were succeeded by a republican, the immortal Lincoln; and though he had to carry on a gigantic war and trust money in the hands of many thousand men to disburse, whose character he had no time to learn before appointment; though large sums were lost in battle or sunk in the sea, the loss during his four years was seventy-six cents on each $1,000, or less than one-fifth of Buchanan's loss; less than one-fifteenth of Van Buren's loss; less than one-tenth of Jackson's loss, and one-eleventh of Monroe's loss. The ratio of loss in Washington's administration was three times greater than Lincoln's.

We may now come down to the present Administration—an administration denounced by the democrats from one end of the country to the other as corrupt. It appears that the ratio of loss on each thousand dollars during Grant's six years is only thirty-four cents. Let us compare this loss with preceding administrations, and we see that there has been less corruption during the past six years than at any time since the formation of the Government.

Grant's ratio of loss in comparison with Johnson's is three-fifths; with Lincoln, one-half; with Washington, one-seventh; with John Adams, one-eighth; with Jefferson, one-eighth; with Pierce, one-tenth; with Buchanan, one-eleventh; with Madison, Polk, Taylor, and J. Q. Adams, one-twelfth; with Tyler, one-nineteenth; with Jackson, one-twenty-second; with Monroe, one twenty-fifth; and with Martin Van Buren, only about one thirty-fifth.

So we see, Mr. Speaker, that the present Administration, instead of being the most corrupt, stands highest, judging by official reports, and they are the tests by which we and the country must judge. Sir, these figures are not partisan friends and witnesses. They tell the truth to and for all parties. President Grant's administration is higher in the standard of honor, honesty, and fidelity to the country than any preceding administration. The loss in the last democratic administration was $2,659,107.81; and let me call the attention of this House and the country to the fact that this does not include the money stolen by southern democrats when they left the Union in 1861. Every postmaster in the South stole all the Government money in his possession, as well as postage-stamps, which is estimated at $1,000,000! All the moneys in the mints and custom-houses in the South were stolen, amounting to several millions more.

Mr. Speaker, the verdict upon the testimony must be in favor of the republican party for economy and reform.

The Use and Abuse of Silver as Money.

SPEECH OF HON. ABRAM S. HEWITT,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 5, 1876.

The House having under consideration the concurrent resolution reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency to create a commission to consider and report upon the question of the remonetization of silver—

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The discussion has taken a wider range than the provisions of the concurrent resolution reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency would seem to warrant, and has in fact extended to the merits of the bill reported some days since by the Committee on Mines and Mining, entitled "A bill to utilize the product of gold and silver mines, and for other purposes." This extraordinary bill, extraordinary in the nature of its provisions as well as the source from which it comes before the House, contemplates the following ends:

1. That the United States shall purchase all the gold and silver bullion which may be brought to its mints and assay offices and pay for the same in the coin-notes of the United States for gold at the rate of $1 for 25.8 grains, and for silver at the rate of $1 for 412.8 grains.

2. It directs the coinage of silver dollars, not now known to the law, weighing 412.8 grains each of standard silver.

3. It provides that the coin-notes so issued shall be receivable without limit for all dues to the United States, and that the silver dollars so coined shall be a legal tender for all debts, public and private, not specified to be paid in gold coin.

4. For the redemption of these coin-notes a fund equal to 75 per cent. of the amount outstanding shall always be kept on hand in the public depositories of the United States.

The arguments which have been presented in favor of this measure appear to be as follows:

1. That the act of February 10, 1873, by which the silver dollar was demonetized was passed surreptitiously, and that Congress was purposely kept in the dark as to its real nature and the effect of its provisions. In other words, that Congress did not intend to demonetize the silver dollar and that the bill could not have been passed if it had been understood that no more silver dollars could be coined after its passage.

2. That Congress has the right to restore the coin of the same weight and fineness as it contained prior to 1873, and to use it as a legal tender for the payment of all debts contracted prior to that date not specifically payable in gold coin.

3. That the debtor class in this country, now suffering from the oppression of the creditor class, will thereby be greatly relieved, because debts can be discharged in a less costly medium than that now required by law, to wit, legal-tender notes or gold coin.

4. That the burden of the public debt of the United States and of the several States and municipalities, now too heavy to be borne, will be greatly lessened, and industry, being thus relieved from taxation, will again become active and labor will be fully employed and better paid.

5. That the price of silver will be raised in consequence of the enlarged field for its use and a better market secured for one of the leading products of the American soil.

REMONSTRANCE OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Against this bill I am charged by the Chamber of Commerce of the City of New York "to remonstrate in its behalf as unjustly and needlessly permitting the payment at par of more than $11,000,000,000 of public and private debts by silver coin now depreciated in market at least 18 per cent. and liable to still further fluctuation and depression. Of this debt more than two thousand millions exist in the accumulated savings of many years invested in policies on lives, the holders of which will be despoiled of the 18 per cent. being three hundred and sixty millions. The holders of mortgages on property in all parts of the United States for at least $5,000,000,000, and many of them ill able to bear the loss, will lose their 18 per cent., being at least nine hundred millions. All these immense sums extracted from suffering individuals are bestowed by the bill on the debtors, without any equivalent justification or any public gain whatever."

In submitting this remonstrance, let me say that in my judgment it does not overstate the injury which will be inflicted upon the creditor class of the country, who are never supposed to be its enemies until after they have parted with their money, and for whose advent our fellow-citizens in the South and West are anxiously waiting, when they tell us that more capital is needed for the development of their great natural resources. But if there were any doubt upon the subject, the source from which the remonstrance emanates should lay the doubt at rest. For more than a century the Chamber of Commerce has been a recognized authority upon all questions pertaining to exchanges and finance.

It is composed now, as it always has been, of the leading merchants, bankers, and manufacturers of the city of New York. It numbers over seven hundred members, whose occupation, training, and interests have necessarily made them familiar with the laws of trade and the delicate elements which affect credit, public and private. They become thus not merely experts, so to speak, in all matters of finance, but they are to a large extent the jealous guardians of commercial honor, which lies at the foundation of the national prosperity. Their voice is entitled, therefore, to great weight, greater possibly than the report even of a committee of this House, whose duty under the rules is not to consider questions of finance at all, but is strictly limited "to consider all subjects relating to mines and mining that may be referred to them, and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions relative thereto as may seem to them expedient." (Rule 153.)

Let me say right here, as the chairman of the committee has complained that the bill has been resisted by tactics commonly known as filibustering, he has no just ground of complaint when he reflects that when the Committee on Mines and Mining undertakes to deal with the question of what shall be the legal tender for the payment of debts, a subject entirely foreign under the rules to its domain, as foreign as the tariff question, it sets an example of improper use of its opportunities which can fairly and indeed only be met by such opposition as is secured under the rules of the House, adopted to meet just such violations of propriety.

But to return to the remonstrance, to the serious allegations of which I invite the attention of the House. Summed up in one word, it charges that the bill under consideration means spoliation under the guise of law, against which the highest financial and commercial authority on the American continent enters its solemn protest; spoliation, I venture to say, upon a scale so vast as to dwarf the plunder of India under Warren Hastings, and which renders ridiculous the sum-total of the extravagant expenditures of the last eight years, upon the investigation of which this House and its committees have expended their energies during the present session of Congress.

OPERATION OF THE BLAND BILL.

Let me explain, although it ought to be clear without even a word of explanation, the process by which this spoliation will be accomplished. As the law now stands, all existing contracts for the payment of money must be discharged either in gold coin or in legal-tender notes. Now this bill proposes to make silver a legal tender for the payment of debts in all cases where the word coin or dollars is used, in all public and private contracts at the rate of 412.8 grains standard silver to the dollar, the value of which at fifty pence per ounce, the quotation of to-day, is 84.8 cents. Under the pledge of the act of 1869 the legal-tender notes of the United States are redeemable in coin, which all the world has heretofore taken to mean gold coin, and their market value has been and is to-day fixed with reference to redemption in gold coin. With gold at a premium of 11¼, these notes are worth 89.8 cents to the dollar; but if they are to be redeemed in silver coin, worth only 84.8 cents to the dollar, they will necessarily fall to the same discount with reference to the value of silver as they now occupy with reference to gold; in other words, they will be worth 73.1 instead of 84.8 cents in gold. The result is, therefore, that on all money contracts, whether payable in coin or in paper, there would be an immediate confiscation of the property of the creditor by act of Congress of 15 per cent. of his just claim. In the aggregate this would amount to a transfer, so far as the act of Congress could have any effect, from the creditor to the debtor class of a sum greater than the entire debt of the United States.

The advocates of the bill admit that this is one of the objects which they have in view. They call it "relief to the debtor class." They forget, however, that the laws of nature cannot be reversed by acts of Congress. It is true that the bill will authorize the debtor to discharge his debt with a less valuable commodity than was intended for its discharge at the time the contract was made, but no act of Congress short of a general division of property or an utter cancellation of indebtedness can endow the debtor with the means of payment. He may indeed have a property which, in the present condition of things, would sell for enough to discharge his debt and leave him a surplus. But if this bill be passed, this margin and surplus would disappear with the same rapidity as the golden hues of the clouds after the sun passes below the horizon. In the face of the proposition to confiscate 15 per cent. of all the indebtedness of the country, every dollar of foreign capital would be withdrawn from the country as rapidly as it could be collected, and the steamships could remove it in some form of material value. Every dollar of American capital that could be controlled would in like manner be remitted to foreign countries for safe-keeping or would be hoarded in the secret recesses to which confidence betakes itself in time of spoliation. There would be a universal collection of debts and a universal fall in values, resulting in a general transfer of the properties of the debtors to the creditors in final liquidation of the debt. The country would be one scene of indiscriminate ruin and desolation; the condition of the people would be intolerable, and their just indignation would be visited upon every man and upon any political party who had any part or lot in bringing upon the heads of the people such an irreparable and overwhelming disaster.

Now, let me call the attention of this House to the classes in the community upon whom first would fall the weight of this monstrous iniquity. Of the debt that would be confiscated, more than two thousand millions are in the form of accumulations to meet policies of life insurance. Need I ask this House whether it is the rich or the poor to whom these policies have been issued? We all know that it is the professional man, the clerk, the tradesman, who, earning their living from day to day, endeavor thus to provide for their families when the sustaining and the laboring hand is at length laid low in the grave. Thus, then, it is that the bill proposes to despoil the desolate widows and the helpless orphans of $360,000,000 of that fund, vast in the aggregate, but limited in each individual case, which society has slowly and patiently accumulated as the barrier against suffering and want for the widows and orphans of the nation.

Again, it is estimated that there were $5,000,000,000 invested in bond and mortgage, of which this bill will confiscate $900,000,000. Now, who are the large holders of these mortgages? Not the rich mainly, but the savings-banks, who hold in trust the scanty earnings of the poor. Upon the day-laborer, upon the industrious servant girl, upon the frugal mechanic, therefore, will fall this unparalleled and incredible loss of the means accumulated against a rainy day.

This expected but fallacious "relief to the debtor" therefore would be at the expense of those who, too poor to get in debt, have with the patient industry which characterizes honest labor and humble station, accumulated a provision against the ills of life, the decay of old age, and the dreaded refuge of the poor-house. It is the old story of the poor sacrificed to the demands of the needy speculator and the grasping adventurer. The only protection against such robbery and such disaster lies in the good sense and solid integrity of the American people, who have only to be made acquainted with the effects of this legislation to set upon it the seal of their just condemnation.

Now let us examine the grounds upon which this monstrous proposition is sought to be justified.

We are told that prior to 1873 it was the right of the Government and of private individuals to discharge their debts either in gold or silver at the option of the debtor, and that this right was taken away without their knowledge and consent, in fact by covert legislation, the effect of which was not intended or appreciated by the Congress which enacted it.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] on the 3d instant stated that the coinage act of 1873 "was passed surreptitiously and without discussion, and was one of the grossest measures of injustice ever inflicted upon any people." The honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] and the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] have made similar statements, and these statements have been reiterated by the press of the country and repeated again to-day by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT.] In answer to these charges I propose, at the risk of being tedious, but in order to refute them once for all, to give, in a note at the end of my remarks, the history of the coinage act of 1873, as shown by the records of the Treasury Department and of Congress.

I have felt it necessary to make this weary statement in order to prove that the legislation of 1873 was not surreptitiously enacted, traveling over ground that has been occupied in part by other members who have addressed the House, and in part by the daily press, because there is nothing so unpalatable to the American people as "tricks" in legislation, of which the Committee on Mines and Mining will be fully conscious when it comes to be generally understood how far they have exceeded the legitimate line of their duty in bringing forward this bill, which could never have been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which it properly belonged.

POWER OF CONGRESS TO REMONETIZE SILVER.

But admitting that there was nothing underhand in the legislation of 1873, it will be asked whether it is not true that prior to that date debts might have been discharged in silver dollars weighing 412.5 grains; and, if so, have we not a legal and moral right to restore the dollar to circulation in order that debts contracted prior to that date may be paid in such dollars? To this question I reply that certainly prior to the passage of the law of 1873 debts might have been paid in such silver dollars, but now we have neither the legal nor the moral right to pay debts in silver dollars worth less than the value of the standard gold dollar, which is now the sole unit of value. We have an undoubted right to remonetize the silver dollar, and it may be wise to do so, but if we do it we are legally and morally bound to put in it enough silver to make it equal in value to the gold dollar. Not to do this is to violate equally the plain provisions of the Constitution and of the moral law.

What are the provisions of the Constitution in regard to money? No power is anywhere granted to Congress to make gold and silver, or indeed anything whatever, a legal tender. The language of the Constitution, article 1, section 8, is:

> That Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures.

There is no other grant of power in regard to money whatever; and if under this provision Congress has the power to deal with the question of legal tender at all, there is no limitation whatever upon that power, and it has the right to select any material besides gold and silver as a legal tender for the payment of debts; but there is a restriction upon the States, article 1, section 10:

> No State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, and no State shall pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts.

Taking these two provisions of the Constitution together, their intention would clearly seem to be as follows: Individuals may make contracts payable in dollars. Such contracts cannot be impaired by any action of any State government, and the dollars represented in the contract must be either gold or silver dollars. These dollars must be provided by Congress and the value thereof must be regulated by Federal law. Now what is meant by the word "value?" Is it the true or false value? Could it have been intended by the framers of the Constitution that Congress should have power to give to either gold or silver a fictitious and unreal value? If so, what is meant by the word "regulate?" This word is derived from the Latin "regula," a rule of length. Worcester defines the word:

> To adjust by rule or by method; to put or to keep in order.

Webster defines the word:

> To put in good order; as, to regulate the disordered state of a nation or its finances.

Congress is therefore to measure the value of the money it coins not once for all, but is to regulate it and adjust its relative value from time to time as with a rule, according as necessity or occasion may require. That this is the intention of this provision is evident from its collocation with the words "and fix the standard of weights and measures." Money was to be "regulated;" that is, measured and adjusted; but the standard of weights and measures was to be fixed; that is, not changed and altered from time to time. The reason is obvious; the standards of weights and measures may be fixed by the eternal standards of nature, such as an arc of the meridian; but gold and silver, depending for their value upon supply and demand, must fluctuate in relative value, and must, therefore, be regulated as to each other in order that no injustice may be done in the current transactions of commerce. This view, which is too plain to admit of doubt, is confirmed by the insertion of the words "and of foreign coin," which, being dependent for standard and weight upon the action of foreign powers, must necessarily be regulated from time to time with reference to their intrinsic value, and not fixed as is the case of the standard of weights and measures.

It is plain, therefore, that the power of Congress under the Constitution is limited to the coining of money, and that it is the duty of Congress to regulate the value of the money which it may coin, according to its intrinsic worth as determined by its value as bullion in the markets of the world, and that if this value changes enough to produce disturbances in business, to inquire into and regulate the value of "money" according to the state of facts as developed by the inquiry.

That this is the true view of the constitutional power and duty of Congress is made apparent by one other consideration not often perceived. The amount of "money" in actual use and being is always small compared with the volume of business. It is the measure of value, however, for all transactions. If the measure be false, there will be injustice done in each transaction. The loss resulting from the re-adjustment of value in the measure will be trifling, therefore, compared with the whole volume of transactions. The settlements of a single day at the New York clearing-house amount to nearly $50,000,000, which are effected by the actual transfer of less than $2,500,000. Now, if the measure be wrong to the extent of 5 per cent., the daily loss to some one will be greater than the whole amount required to effect the daily payment of balances. It was the perception of this truth which led the government of William III to recall the clipped and worn silver coinage in 1695 and replace it with full coin of standard weight, and to charge the cost thereof up to the nation and not leave it upon the innocent holders of the depreciated coin. The total cost of this operation was £2,415,140, a sum less than the losses caused by the depreciated coin in business operations of every year, possibly of every month. The force of this rule increases directly with the volume of business, so that in modern times, when it becomes necessary to re-adjust the values of outstanding coin, it is accepted that the nation, and not the individual holders, must bear the loss. This rule is now being applied to the replacement of the German coinage.

Fortunately we have now no such loss to meet; but the statement of the principle serves to indicate what must have been the solution of the difficulty if we had found ourselves compelled to deal with a large stock of silver dollars in the presence of the recent depreciation of silver. We could only have called them in and replaced them with new dollars containing the necessary additional silver to have restored them to their equivalency with the gold dollar. The loss of this operation would have been insignificant compared with the stupendous losses which would otherwise have occurred in the settlement of existing indebtedness.

This doctrine of equivalency must prevail in all countries maintaining the double standard, which cannot exist without it, and in practice does not long exist anywhere, because it involves too frequent changes in the weight of coins. The cessation of the coinage of silver by Switzerland and its limitation by the Latin Union is a practical abandonment of the double standard for the time being, and its restoration cannot be safely attempted until the relation between the value of gold and silver shall have once more become stable.

HISTORY OF AMERICAN COINAGE.

The money history of the United States has been in strict accordance with this doctrine. At the foundation of the Government the dollar in use was the standard Spanish milled dollar. All contracts for hard money were payable in these dollars. In order that no injustice might be done to debtors or creditors it was necessary to determine the quantity of silver contained in these dollars. Hamilton undertook the task, and after an elaborate investigation, including careful assays of average specimens, fixed upon 371¼ grains of pure silver as the standard value. This formed the basis of our system of coinage. He next determined the equivalent in gold at its then market value of 371¼ grains of silver, and fixed it at 27 grains. Owing to an error in the calculation the gold was slightly undervalued, and never, therefore, came into use, but the cheaper medium, the silver dollar, was the actual standard of value. This was the era of the silver dollar, and it continued to be the sole medium of legal tender in use until 1834. At that time the best financial minds of the country, such as Gallatin, Ingham, and others, came to the conclusion that the interests of the nation required that gold should be brought into circulation. It was a legal tender but it did not circulate, because it was undervalued. For that reason the owner of gold bullion did not bring it to the Mint to be coined.

And just here it will be well, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House to the true functions of the Mint as at that time prescribed by law. These functions have been largely overlooked, forgotten, and misunderstood in the confusion which has grown out of the substitution of legal-tender paper money for gold and silver coin.

The Mint of the United States was never an institution in which the Government manufactured money on its own account and supplied it to the public at a profit. It was merely a factory, to which citizens brought their bullion and plate and had it converted into coin or money at a fixed charge, which sufficed merely to cover the cost of the operation. The stamp of the Government was merely a certificate of value, and no more, impressed by the Government upon the property of the citizen. The Government did not buy the bullion and sell the coin, it merely received the bullion, stamped it, and returned it to its lawful owner. Hence new light is thrown upon that provision of the Constitution which requires Congress "to coin money and regulate the value thereof," for it was the property of individuals which was to be coined and the value of which was to be regulated by the Government, which had no other interest or duty but to impress upon it the true and not a fictitious value.

Now, as the value which the law required the Mint to stamp upon gold was less than its commercial value, no gold was brought to the Mint to be stamped. The commerce of the world, and especially of the most progressive nations, such as England and Holland, was mainly carried on in gold. All bills of exchange settled in London and Amsterdam, the principal financial marts of the world, were payable in gold. Our own commerce was then in a rapid state of development, and our statesmen perceived that we needed a gold unit of value for its lubrication and growth. What did they do? They let silver alone, because it was the existing unit of value in all contracts. To change it would work injustice to debtors and creditors alike. They therefore brought the weight of the gold dollar down to the value of the silver dollar, and, in order to make it circulate, a bare trifle below it. Thus they did exact justice to debtors and creditors, or rather so little injustice that its effect was imperceptible and of no consequence compared with the advantages of securing the circulation and establishment of a gold unit of value in harmony with the currency of the nations with whom we had large commercial relations.

Thus and then ceased the first or silver era and began the second or golden era of the American coinage. Silver dollars slowly but surely disappeared from circulation, because they were slightly undervalued as coin, and it paid to export them or melt them up. The gold dollar weighing 25.8 grains took the place of the silver dollar, and from 1837 until the passage of the paper legal-tender act in 1862 gold dollars were the sole unit of value in the United States. Although gold and silver dollars were equally a legal tender for the payment of debts, in fact for more than a generation, nearly forty years, gold only was the metal in use for payments exceeding $1; and when the legal-tender act was passed the value of the notes issued under it was referred to the standard of gold, and gold only. This was still the case in 1873, when the silver dollar was demonetized. No one referred to silver as the standard of value, because the silver dollar was then more valuable than the gold dollar, being worth $1.03, and had not been in use for forty years. Hence in the revision of the coinage laws it was treated, and properly so, as an obsolete coin, which had not been in use for a generation, and which in the ordinary course of things would never come into use again. No one desired it for the payment of debts, for all debts had in effect been contracted on the basis of the gold dollar, and no one expected either to receive or give anything else in payment where coin was to be paid. The abolition therefore of the silver dollar in 1873 did no injustice to any human being; and even if the allegation were true, as I have shown it not to be, that it was done in the dark, it was a deed by which no one was injured and no existing right impaired.

EQUIVALENCY OF VALUE.

It is now demanded that the silver dollar be restored; and let it be conceded for the sake of argument, as may possibly be found to be the fact, that it is expedient to yield to this demand. Upon what basis of value shall it be restored? How many grains of silver shall it contain? The Committee on Mines and Mining say 412.8 grains, worth with silver at fifty and three-fourths per ounce about eighty-four cents in gold. Let it be noted that the old silver dollar only contained 412.5 grains, so that the committee do not adhere to it. Why do they make any change if they plant themselves on the old silver dollar? The Constitution says that Congress shall "coin money and regulate the value thereof." They propose to make a new coin, a dollar which does not now exist and as reported by them never known to the law. They must regulate its value. They cannot shut their eyes to this duty. They cannot shirk it. They must regulate its value. By what standard? There is but one standard of value in existence, which is the gold dollar or unit of value. The new coin or silver dollar must therefore be regulated by the gold dollar now in use, and with reference to it alone, for there is no other standard or unit of value known to the law. No act of Congress can make 412.8 grains of silver worth a dollar in gold when a dollar in gold will purchase, as it can to-day, 480 grains of silver in the open market. If Congress should attempt to do this in the face of large purchases daily made by the Director of the Mint at the rate of 480 grains to the dollar, the Supreme Court of the United States would be bound to hold that Congress had not regulated the value of the new coin, but had given it a false value, and violated the express provisions of the Constitution. This much is clear; but whether the Supreme Court might not go further and decide that in making this silver dollar a legal tender for the payment of debts, except to and from the Government, Congress had exceeded its authority, I am not the person to venture an opinion; but I can find no authority in the Constitution for such legislation.

Having thus, as I believe, clearly demonstrated that Congress has no legal right to make a creditor receive 412.8 grains of silver in lieu of a gold dollar which will purchase 480 grains, it seems to me quite superfluous to attempt to show that it has no moral right to do so. A man may voluntarily take less than he is entitled to, but to force him to receive less than his money would purchase in open market is a manifest wrong which requires no elucidation. No wrong was done to the debtor in 1873 by the abolition of the silver dollar then worth more than the gold dollar, and which had not been in use within the existence of the present generation. All that it did was to take away the unexpected and unseen possibility of paying the creditor in less value than either party expected or in reality contracted to pay.

The operation of a law which would make 412.8 grains of silver a legal dollar cannot be better illustrated than by following through the purchase of silver by the Director of the Mint for the manufacture of subsidiary coin under the recent legislation of Congress. The Government sells one million of 5 per cent. bonds for par in gold. This gold is sold for legal-tender notes at a premium of 12 per cent. and produces $1,112,000 in greenbacks. These purchase, with silver at fifty and three-quarter pence per ounce, about $1,200,000 in standard silver. Now, suppose the seller of the silver to have kept his legal-tender notes on deposit until after the passage of the proposed bill; the notes will then be payable in silver instead of gold, but as they are not at present redeemable in anything, they will fall to a discount as compared with silver equal to the present discount as compared with gold; that is, about 12 per cent. The seller of the silver would therefore be able with his greenbacks to purchase only $1,000,000 of silver to replace the proceeds of the $1,200,000 which he had sold to the Government shortly before, thus losing two hundred thousand dollars' worth of silver by act of Congress, and without any fault of his own, except the belief, which he has shared with all the world, that the legal-tender notes would be redeemed in gold and not in silver.

PERTURBATIONS IN THE VALUE OF SILVER.

If, therefore, we legislate upon this subject at all, we are bound by the express directions of the Constitution, as well as by the dictates of common honesty, to adopt the true and not a false ratio of value between the two metals. But who can tell what is the true ratio? To-day silver is selling at 51*d.* per ounce, and a week ago it was selling at 46¾*d.* per ounce. On the 16th of March last, when I had the honor to address the House upon this subject, the price was 53*d.* per ounce. In the month of January last it was 56½*d.* per ounce, and the extreme low point which it has reached in 1876 is 18 per cent. below the average value of 1875. These perturbations can only be compared to the variations of the thermometer during the last week. This, then, is a time when no man of wisdom in monetary affairs can determine the true ratio of value between gold and silver, as required by the Constitution. It is therefore a time absolutely unsuitable for legislation upon this subject. It is an epoch of perturbation in the price of silver more marked than has ever before occurred in the history of the precious metals. In the long period of time for which we have authentic data, from 1687 to 1872, the variations in the relative value of gold and silver were between 14.74 and 15.83; and during our whole political history of one hundred years the ratio ranged between 15 and 16 until the present year, when the range has been between 16 and 20, involving a fall of 18 per cent. in the value of silver in a single year. Now, where is the man who can tell us whether silver is going up or going down relatively to gold? Who can tell us whether the present ratio is likely to be permanent or whether there is to be a sudden rise in the value of silver or a fall still greater than that which has occurred?

Who can determine the duration of the causes which have produced this fall? First of these comes the yield of the American silver-mines, now estimated at $40,000,000 yearly, and there is every reason to believe that the product of the American mines will steadily increase. The second cause, the demonetization of silver begun in Germany, will have spent its force when the stock of silver on hand in that country shall have been disposed of. And this is a striking evidence of the sensitiveness of the market for silver, that the attempt to sell so small an amount as $40,000,000, not more than the product of the American mines for a single year, should cause a fall in the price of silver in London of from five to eight pence per ounce. The third agency producing the fall in the value of silver is the present apparent saturation of India and China with that material; in other words, those countries no longer absorb the surplus silver of the world. Now who can tell how long these causes will continue to operate? Even if Germany should relieve itself of its surplus silver, what policy will the Latin Union adopt in regard to their silver?

THE DOUBLE STANDARD.

The whole course of commerce points to the adoption of the single gold standard throughout the civilized world for all purposes except subsidiary coinage. The difficulties in the way of a double standard, always serious, would appear to be insuperable in view of the extraordinary fluctuations in the value of silver, and it would be only possible to preserve the double standard by frequent changes in the value of silver coin, involving through its recoinage such confusion in the current business of society that it would become an intolerable nuisance. Nor would this confusion be abated by the adoption of the silver standard alone. So far as foreign commerce is concerned settlements would have to be made in the gold standard, and the fluctuations of exchange would be aggregated by the daily fluctuations in silver. The views of John Stuart Mill upon this subject are so clearly stated, that I do not see how they can be regarded otherwise than as decisive.*

WHAT WE ARE ASKED TO DO.

I need not tell the House that the question of the value of silver is a disturbing element at the present time, not only in this country, but throughout Europe; that the fall in value has produced great distress throughout the eastern world, and India is said to be in a state of general bankruptcy in consequence of the inability of debtors to discharge their obligations even though the money in which they were payable has fallen in value, because capital has taken fright and sternly locks itself up until a calm judgment can be formed as to a future market for silver. Fortunately the United States have escaped these great evils. Owing to the suspension of specie payments and the demonetization of silver in 1873 we are not forced to deal with the question of the depreciation of our coinage. We are thus relieved from the difficulties which beset England in its Indian Empire, France and the Latin Union in regard to their double standard, and Germany in its effort to establish a single gold standard. But the proposition of this bill is that, being free from the embarrassment of the question, we shall deliberately load ourselves down with its difficulties, and by making a market for the surplus silver which has produced all these disastrous consequences, transfer to ourselves the burden of the settlement of this difficult problem. And, as I have already shown, we are asked to take all these consequences upon our shoulders without the slightest obligation on our part to do so, and without the possibility of any benefit either to the country or to the producers of silver.

HOW IT WOULD AFFECT THE GOVERNMENT.

It is alleged, it is true, that the effect of the passage of this bill will be to raise the price of silver, and that we ought to pass it because silver is a domestic product. This is putting the doctrine of protection to a new use. If silver is to continue to be one of our exports, it can be sold abroad at its current commercial value; but it will not go abroad unless we are prepared to sell it at that price. But it is alleged that this bill will command a use for it at home and gradually raise its price here. If this be true, it would surely make a market for the surplus German silver, and all the silver which is now weighing down the markets of the world would simply be poured in upon our market and be sold to the Government at the rate of 412.8 grains to the dollar, when in fact a dollar should purchase 480 grains. Our gold would be thus driven out of the country and everything of value which could be exchanged for silver would follow the gold, just as happened in Japan under similar conditions, and the Government would become the owner of an enormous stock of silver bullion, upon which in fact it would have to pay the interest and levy it in the form of taxes upon the people and the industries of the country. For the bullion so purchased the coin notes would be issued. These coin notes being receivable for public dues, the Government would have no revenue except in the shape of coin notes, which it could pay out only in the purchase of bullion, because the Constitution confers no authority on the Government to make them legal-tenders from the Government to its creditors, and the bill before us now does not attempt it. How, then, would the Government meet its current expenses? It must either borrow money by the issue of bonds bearing interest or it would have to sell its accumulated silver which it had purchased at the rate of 412.8 grains to the dollar at the best price it could get for it in the markets of the world. To-day it might sell it at the rate of 480 grains to the dollar, which would involve a loss of 15 per cent., but inasmuch as there would be no other market for it except at such rates as would permit its use in the arts, it is manifest that the price would fall very much below the lowest limit which it has yet touched. Nor could any remedy for this embarrassment be found in increased taxes, for they would be paid in these coin notes, which could only be used for the purchase of more bullion.

The whole proposition, therefore, simply resolves itself into an attempt on the part of the owners of the silver-mines to sell their entire product to the Government of the United States at a price 15 per cent. above its present market value for their own personal profit, with the dead certainty that Government could not resell the accumulated bullion, not only of our own markets, but of the world, except at a frightful loss, which must be borne by the tax-payers of this country.

THE COIN NOTES CANNOT CIRCULATE AS MONEY.

This proposition is so plain that I am overcome with astonishment at the audacity of its authors, whoever they may be, and the failure of the Committee on Mines and Mining to comprehend the fatal bearings of the bill which they have reported. But we shall be told that these coin notes would circulate as money and drive out the legal-tender notes. As no provision is made for the retirement of the legal-tender notes I cannot see where they would be driven to,

*§ 1. Though the qualities necessary to fit any commodity for being used as money are rarely united in any considerable perfection, there are two commodities which possess them in an eminent and nearly an equal degree, the two precious metals, as they are called: gold and silver. Some nations have accordingly attempted to compose their circulating medium of these two metals indiscriminately.

There is an obvious convenience in making use of the more costly metal for larger payments and the cheaper one for smaller; and the only question relates to the mode in which this can best be done. The mode most frequently adopted has been to establish between the two metals a fixed proportion; to decide, for example, that a gold coin called a sovereign should be equivalent to twenty of the silver coins called shillings; both the one and the other being called, in the ordinary money of account of the country, by the same denomination, a pound; and it being left free to every one who has a pound to pay, either to pay it in the one metal or in the other.

At the time when the valuation of the two metals relatively to each other—say twenty shillings to the sovereign or twenty-one shillings to the guinea—was first made, the proportion probably corresponded, as nearly as it could be made to do, with the ordinary relative values of the two metals, grounded on their cost of production; and if those natural or cost values always continued to bear the same ratio to one another, the arrangement would be unobjectionable. This, however, is far from being the fact. Gold and silver, though the least variable in value of all commodities, are not invariable and do not always vary simultaneously. Silver, and if both classes of notes should, in effect, continue in circulation, the result would be inflation to the extent of the whole amount of the coin notes issued. But this result is impossible, for the legal-tender notes becoming redeemable in silver instead of gold, and not being payable on demand, would at once fall to a discount upon the price of silver equal to the present discount upon the price of gold. In other words, they would be at a discount of 12 per cent. upon the value of the silver-coin notes. They would therefore be the inferior currency, and, being a legal-tender for the payment of debts, would continue to circulate to the exclusion of the coin notes, which would only be used for the payment of the duties upon imports. The only effect they could have would be to drive out all the gold from the country, because there would be no longer any use for gold, the duties being payable in silver, which the Government would be expected to use by the advocates of this bill for the payment of interest upon the public debt.

HOW SHALL WE PAY THE NATIONAL DEBT?

Thus we are brought face to face with the proposition that the public debt shall be paid principal and interest in silver coin at the rate of 412.8 grains to the dollar, which has had no existence in law since 1873, and had no existence in fact since 1834. And we deliberately propose to adopt this mode of payment because silver has fallen below its value at the time of the contract, and we can thereby make a profit at the expense of the national creditors. If the authors of this scheme reflected that it will be at the expense of the national credit; that it will be regarded by the whole civilized world as an act of deliberate robbery; that it will be henceforth impossible to convert any more of our 6 per cent. bonds into new bonds bearing a lower rate of interest; that on the fourteen hundred millions of debt yet remaining to be provided for we should thus lose at least 2 per cent. annually, amounting to $28,000,000 per annum, and that we should practically isolate ourselves from the commerce of the globe as much as China was formerly shut in from the civilized world, and that we should be regarded as a nation incapable of comprehending the first principles of common honesty, they would take pause and shudder at the disastrous consequences involved in the ill-considered bill which they have reported "to utilize the products of the gold and silver mines" at the expense of the prosperity and the honor of the country. Let it not be forgotten that "Honor's train is longer than his foreskirt."

WHO WILL BE PROFITED?

And now let us consider for a moment who is to profit by this monstrous proposition. So far as the country is concerned, it is evident that there can only be loss, without any corresponding justification or advantage whatever, and the end must be such a general destruction in the values of property as to plunge the nation into difficulties and distress which it would require the patient efforts and the wise statesmanship of a whole generation to repair. But, in the process of this transfer of property and this destruction of values, the speculator and the gambler would have abundant opportunity to profit at the expense of the whole community.

Pass this bill, and the rise in gold would be measured by the exact difference between the market value of silver and the fictitious value which is imparted to it by the provisions of the bill. The rise would be from 15 to 20 per cent., according to the fluctuations in the price of silver. On every million of dollars on which the gold-gamblers have gone "long," there would be a profit of from one hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand dollars, and the number of millions to which this fraternity would go "long" are only to be estimated by the number of victims who can be found to take part in this game of "heads I win, and tails you lose."

Again the owners of the Bonanza mines, who, by the fall in the value of silver, are receiving $6,000,000 annually less than they expected to get, would, by reason of the expected advantages of the legislation, be enabled to impart new life to their decaying stocks, and thus transfer to a confiding public, at high prices, property which is becoming too precarious for these sagacious operators longer to retain. Thus only have I been able to explain for myself, and I trust I have made it plain to this House, and that the country will understand, how it has been possible to get this bill reported from a committee which is not charged under the rules with the consideration of financial bills of any kind whatever, much less of one which unsettles the whole financial system of this country and attacks the foundations upon which public and private credit has hitherto securely rested. It proposes a revolution before which all political questions sink into insignificance; it undertakes at the heels of the session, and practically without debate, the decision of one of the greatest and the gravest questions now before the world; one which has already involved the Indian Empire in disaster and bankruptcy; one upon which a British commission has been in session for months; one upon which a committee of the House of Peers of the French Republic has been and is still is session; one which seriously disturbs the German fiscal system and has caused the Latin Union to stop its coinage; one upon which the wisest and best political economists of the world are in doubt and at variance. This great question, which affects every household throughout the civilized globe, is sought to be disposed of by an inappropriate committee of this House as the Doorkeeper would brush away a cobweb from one corner of this Hall.

REFERENCE TO A COMMISSION.

If these gentlemen really desire to deal intelligently with this great question, let them withdraw their bill and support the concurrent resolution now pending for the appointment of a commission of competent experts to consider this matter in all its bearings, political, financial, and social, and to report the results of the investigation at the next session of Congress, when they can be discussed with deliberation, good temper, and calm judgment, so that the really serious interests involved may be cared for with wisdom and with statesmanship.

CONCLUSION.

It would seem to be clear, then, that the proposed legislation is not in the public interest, but in furtherance of private speculation at the expense of the public welfare, whereby the property of creditors will be needlessly confiscated, involving debtors and creditors in one common ruin; whereby the savings of the poorer classes will be despoiled by the shrinkage in their value, and the provision made for widows and orphans through the beneficent agency of life-insurance will be impaired; whereby it will become impossible to fund the public debt at a lower rate of interest, thus perpetuating the heavy burden of taxation; whereby American credit will be ruined at home and abroad, and an irreparable check will be given to our slowly returning prosperity; whereby a precedent will be set, dangerous to the commonwealth and fatal to our liberties, of using the sovereign power to coin money for the express benefit of private and individual interests, which if followed up must end in the destruction of free government.

Summing up the whole matter, I conclude that the demonetization of the silver dollar in 1873 was not effected by surreptitious or improper legislation; that while it is competent for Congress to order the coinage of a new silver dollar, it has no right in law or morals to give it any other value than one which conforms strictly to the value of the existing standard of value, which is the gold dollar; that the debtor class will not only not experience any relief if the proposed legislation should be enacted, but would be hopelessly ruined; that this legislation would not reduce the burden of national, State, and for example, was lowered in permanent value more than gold by the discovery of the American mines; and those small variations of value which take place occasionally do not affect both metals alike. Suppose such a variation to take place, the value of the two metals relatively to one another no longer agreeing with their rated proportion, one or the other of them will now be rated below its bullion value and there will be a profit to be made by melting it.

Suppose, for example, that gold rises in value relatively to silver, so that the quantity of gold in a sovereign is now worth more than the quantity of silver in twenty shillings. Two consequences will ensue. No debtor will any longer find it his interest to pay in gold. He will always pay in silver, because twenty shillings are a legal tender for a debt of one pound, and he can procure silver convertible into twenty shillings for less gold than that contained in a sovereign. The other consequence will be that unless a sovereign can be sold for more than twenty shillings all the sovereigns will be melted, since as bullion they will purchase a greater number of shillings than they exchange for as coin. The converse of all this would happen if silver instead of gold were the metal which had risen in comparative value. A sovereign would not now be worth so much as twenty shillings, and whoever had a pound to pay would prefer paying it by a sovereign; while the silver coins would be collected for the purpose of being melted and sold as bullion for gold at their real value, that is, above the legal valuation. The money of the community, therefore, would never really consist of both metals, but of the one only which at the particular time best suited the interest of debtors; and the standard of the currency would be constantly liable to change from the one metal to the other, at a loss on each change of the expense of coinage on the metal which fell out of use.

It appears, therefore, that the value of money is liable to more frequent fluctuations when both metals are a legal-tender at a fixed valuation than when the exclusive standard of the currency is either gold or silver. Instead of being only affected by variations in the cost of production of one metal, it is subject to derangement from those of two. The particular kind of variation to which a currency is rendered more liable by having two legal standards is a fall of value, or what is commonly called a depreciation; since practically that one of the two metals will always be the standard of which the real has fallen below the rated value. If the tendency of the metals be to rise in value, all payments will be made in the one which has risen the least; and if to fall, then in that which has fallen most.

§ 2. The plan of a double standard is still occasionally brought forward by here and there a writer or orator as a great improvement in currency. It is probable that with most of its adherents its chief merit is its tendency to a sort of depreciation, there being at all times abundance of supporters for any mode, either open or covert, of lowering the standard. Some, however, are influenced by an exaggerated estimate of an advantage which to a certain extent is real, that of being able to have recourse for replenishing the circulation, to the united stock of gold and silver in the commercial world, instead of being confined to one of them, which, from accidental absorption, may not be obtainable with sufficient rapidity. The advantage without the disadvantages of a double standard seems to be best obtained by those nations with whom one only of the two metals is a legal tender, but the other also is coined and allowed to pass for whatever value the market assigns to it.

When this plan is adopted, it is naturally the more costly metal which is left to be bought and sold as an article of commerce. But nations which, like England, adopt the more costly of the two as their standard resort to a different expedient for retaining them both in circulation—namely, to make silver a legal tender, but only for small payments. In England no one can be compelled to receive silver in payment for a larger amount than forty shillings. With this regulation there is necessarily combined another, namely, that silver coin should be rated, in comparison with gold, somewhat above its intrinsic value; that there should not be in twenty shillings as much silver as is worth a sovereign; for if there were a very slight turn of the market in its favor would make it worth more than a sovereign, and it would be profitable to melt the silver coin. The overvaluation of the silver coin creates an inducement to buy silver and send it to the mint to be coined, since it is given back at a higher value than properly belongs to it; this, however, has been guarded against by limiting the quantity of the silver coinage, which is not left, like that of gold, to the discretion of individuals, but is determined by the government, and restricted to the amount supposed to be required for small payments. The only precaution necessary is not to put so high a valuation upon the silver as to hold out a strong temptation to private coining.—John Stuart Mill, Principles of Political Economy, book 2, chapter 10.

municipal taxation, but would make it heavier to be carried; that labor would not be benefited, but that the return to better times would be indefinitely postponed, in consequence of the flight of capital from the walks of industry to regions where it will be safe from spoliation.

I do not conclude, however, that it may not be expedient to remonetize the silver dollar at its real value when it can be determined and upon proper conditions; or that it may not be wise to re-establish the double standard, if it be found to be practicable, which I doubt; or that it may not be the wisest course of all to have but a single standard of silver, which is certainly feasible. Upon these points I reserve my judgment until we can have the report of a competent commission, such as was contemplated in the bill which I had the honor to introduce, the substance of which is incorporated in the concurrent resolution reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency and now before the House, in favor of which I shall record my vote, as the only statesman-like method to deal with a question which puzzles the wisest heads.

NOTE.—On April 25, 1870, the Secretary of the Treasury transmitted the following letter to Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 25, 1870.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a bill revising the laws relative to the Mint, assay offices, and coinage of the United States, and accompanying report. The bill has been prepared under the supervision of John Jay Knox, deputy comptroller of the currency, and its passage is recommended in the form presented. It includes, in a condensed form, all the important legislation upon the coinage, not now obsolete, since the first mint was established, in 1792; and the report gives a concise statement of the various amendments proposed to existing laws and the necessity for the change recommended. There has been no revision of the laws pertaining to the Mint and coinage since 1837, and it is believed that the passage of the inclosed bill will conduce greatly to the efficiency and economy of this important branch of the Government service.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. S. BOUTWELL,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The report and the bill were referred on April 28, 1870, to the Finance Committee of the Senate, and subsequently, on May 2, 1870, five hundred additional copies were ordered to be printed for the use of the Treasury Department. The report says:

The method adopted in the preparation of the bill was first to arrange in as concise a form as possible the laws now in existence upon these subjects, with such additional sections and suggestions as seemed valuable. Having accomplished this, the bill, as thus prepared, was printed upon paper with wide margin, and in this form transmitted to the different mints and assay offices, to the First Comptroller, the Treasurer, the Solicitor, the First Auditor, and to such other gentlemen as are known to be intelligent upon metallurgical and numismatical subjects, with the request that the printed bill should be returned with such notes and suggestions as experience and education should dictate. In this way the views of more than thirty gentlemen who are conversant with the manipulation of metals, the manufacture of coinage, the execution of the present laws relative thereto, the method of keeping accounts, and of making returns to the Department, have been obtained with but little expense to the Department and little inconvenience to correspondents. Having received these suggestions, the present bill has been framed, and is believed to comprise within the compass of eight or ten pages of the Revised Statutes every important provision contained in more than sixty different enactments upon the Mint, assay offices, and coinage of the United States, which are the result of nearly eighty years of legislation upon these subjects.

The amendments proposed by the bill were as follows:

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS.

The new features of the bill now submitted are chiefly: the establishment of a Mint Bureau at the Treasury Department, which shall also have charge of the collection of statistics relative to the precious metals; the consolidation of the office of superintendent with that of the Treasurer, thus abolishing the latter office, and disconnecting the Mint entirely from the office of assistant treasurer; the repeal of the coinage charge, and authorizing the exchange of unparted for refined bars; a reduction in the amount of wastage, and the tolerance (deviation in weight and fineness) in the manufacture of coin; requiring the token coinage to be of one material of uniform value, and to be redeemed under proper regulations when issued in excess, and the expense of its manufacture to be paid from specific appropriations, and not from the gain arising in its manufacture, as heretofore; an entire change in the manner of issuing the silver (subsidiary) coinage; discontinuing the coinage of the silver dollar; limiting the amount of silver to be used as alloy, so as to make the gold coinage of uniform color; the destruction of the dies not in use annually; requiring vouchers to pass between the different officers of the Mint in all transfers of bullion or coin; requiring increased bonds from officers of the Mint, and authorizing each officer to nominate his subordinate before appointment; and also making it an offense to increase or diminish the weights used in the Mint.

The report of Mr. KNOX called special attention to the discontinuance of the silver dollar as a standard, as may be seen from the following paragraph on page 11:

SILVER DOLLAR—ITS DISCONTINUANCE AS A STANDARD.

The coinage of the silver-dollar piece, the history of which is here given, is discontinued in the proposed bill. It is by law the dollar unit, and assuming the value of gold to be fifteen and one-half times that of silver, being about the mean ratio for the past six years, is worth in gold a premium of about 3 per cent. (its value being $103.12) and intrinsically more than 7 per cent. premium in our other silver coins, its value thus being $107.42. The present laws consequently authorize both a gold-dollar unit and a silver-dollar unit, differing from each other in intrinsic value. The present gold-dollar piece is made the dollar unit in the proposed bill, and the silver-dollar piece is discontinued. If, however, such a coin is authorized, it should be issued only as a commercial dollar, not as a standard unit of account, and of the exact value of the Mexican dollar, which is the favorite for circulation in China and Japan and other oriental countries.

The appendix to the report contained a copy of the English coinage act of 1870, and four tables giving (1) the existing coinage, including the silver dollar; (2) the proposed coinage in which the silver dollar was omitted; (3) a metric system of coinage suggesting the issue of a subsidiary silver coinage consisting of two half dollars constituting in weight and fineness an exact equivalent to the French five-franc piece, and a quarter dollar and dime with proportionate weight and fineness, which proposition was finally adopted; (4) a table giving a comparison of coinage existing and proposed. A note at the foot of this table states that the silver dollar, half dime, and three-cent piece are omitted in the proposed bill. Subsequently, on June 25, 1870, the Secretary of the Treasury transmitted to the House of Representatives a letter of the then deputy comptroller of the currency, together with copies of the correspondence of the Department with the officers of the different mints, assay offices, and other experts in reference to the bill and report previously submitted.

The bill in its original form, which was transmitted to the correspondents throughout the country for consideration and comment, contained the following section, as appears from the manuscript copy at the Treasury Department:

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That of the silver coins [the weight of the dollar shall be 384 grains] (now 412½ grains) the weight of the half dollar or piece of fifty cents shall be 192 grains; and that the quarter dollar and dime [and half dime] shall be, respectively, one-half and one-fifth [and one-tenth] of the weight of said half dollar. That the silver coin issued in comformity with the above sections shall be a legal tender in any one payment of debts for all sums [not exceeding $5, except duties on imports] less than $1.

If the words inclosed in [brackets] of the section as here given are excluded and the words in italics included, the section will conform precisely to the section which was transmitted to Congress and which passed the Senate on January 9, 1871.

The dollar of 384 grains was proposed in the rough revision of the bill for the purpose of obtaining an expression of opinion in reference to the proposed omission of the dollar piece and the words "except duties on imports" inserted for the reason that a regulation or usage at the custom-house in New York limits the payment of silver coins to the fractional parts of the dollar, except when the payment to be made is $5 or less. Several gentlemen in their criticisms upon the rough revision of the bill referred to this section.

Hon. James Pollock, the Director of the Mint at Philadelphia, said:

SEC. 11. The reduction of the weight of the whole dollar is approved, and was recommended in my annual report of 1861. (Page 10.)

Mr. Robert Patterson, of Philadelphia, sent to Mr. Knox some notes on the bill suggesting amendments. He called attention to one of these in the following words:

The silver dollar, half dime, and three-cent piece are dispensed with by this amendment. Gold becomes the standard money, of which the gold dollar is the unit. Silver is subsidiary, embracing coins from the dime to half dollar; coins less than the dime are of copper-nickel. The legal tender is limited to necessities of the case; not more than a dollar for such silver or fifteen cents for the nickels.

Mr. Franklin Peale, formerly melter and refiner and chief coiner of the Mint at Philadelphia, recommended the discontinuance of the three and one dollar gold pieces and supplying the place of the latter with a proper silver coin to be used as change. Dr. H. R. Linderman, the present Director of the Mint, said:

Section 11 reduces the weight of the silver dollar from 412½ to 384 grains. I can see no good reason for the proposed reduction in the weight of this coin. It would be better in my opinion to discontinue its issue altogether. The gold dollar is really the legal unit and measure of value. Having a higher value as bullion than its nominal value, the silver dollar long ago ceased to be a coin of circulation; and being of no practical use whatever its issue should be discontinued.

Mr. James Ross Snowden, formerly Director of the Mint, said:

I see that it is proposed to demonetize the silver dollar. This I think unadvisable. Silver coins below the dollar are now not money in a proper sense, but only tokens. I do not like the idea of reducing the silver dollar to that level. It is quite true that the silver dollar, being more valuable than two half dollars or four quarter dollars, will not be used as a circulating medium, but only for cabinets and perhaps to supply some occasional or local demand; yet I think there is no necessity for so considerable a piece as the dollar to be struck from metal which is only worth ninety-four cents. When we speak of dollars let it be known that we speak of dollars not demonetized and reduced below their intrinsic value, and thus avoid the introduction of contradictory and loose ideas of the standards of value.

Mr. George F. Dunning, formerly superintendent of the United States assay office in New York, proposed that the law in regard to the silver coinage should be in the following language:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the silver coins of the United States shall be a dollar, a half dollar, a quarter dollar, a dime or tenth of a dollar, and a half dime or twentieth of a dollar; and the standard weight of the silver coins shall be in the proportion of 384 grains to the dollar, and these coins shall be a legal tender in all payments not exceeding $5.

The officers of the San Francisco branch mint made the following suggestions:

SEC. 11. Would not the proposed change in the weight of the silver dollar disturb the relative value of all our coinage, affect our commercial conventions, and possibly impair the validity of contracts running through a long period? Might not the dollar be retained as a measure of value, but the coinage of the piece for circulation be discontinued?

Mr. E. B. Elliott, of the Treasury Department, gave a complete history of the silver dollar, and suggested the issue of a commercial dollar of nine-tenths fineness, and containing of pure silver just 25 grams, in place of the then existing silver dollar of 412½ grains; the proposed silver dollar being almost the exact equivalent of the silver contained in the older Spanish-Mexican pillared dollar, established in 1704 by proclamation of Queen Anne as a legal tender of payment and accepted as par of exchange for the British colonies of North America at the rate of fifty-four pence sterling to the dollar, or four and four-ninths dollars to the pound sterling.

On December 19, 1870, the bill was reported from the Finance Committee of the Senate and printed with amendments.

On January 9, 1871, in accordance with previous notice, the bill came before the Senate and was discussed during that day and the following day by Senators SHERMAN, Sumner, BAYARD, Stewart of Nevada, Williams, Casserly, MORRILL, and others, and passed the Senate on the 10th by a vote of 36 yeas to 14 nays.

On January 13, 1871, on motion of Hon. WILLIAM D. KELLEY, the Senate bill was ordered to be printed. On February 25, 1871, Mr. KELLEY, the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, reported the bill back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, when it was again printed and recommitted. Mr. KELLEY again, on March 9, 1871, introduced the bill in the Forty-second Congress, when it was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Coinage when appointed.

On January 9, 1872, the bill was reported by Mr. KELLEY, chairman of the Coinage Committee, with the recommendation that it pass. The bill was read, and discussed at length by Messrs. KELLEY, Potter, GARFIELD, Maynard, DAWES, HOLMAN, and others. Mr. KELLEY, in the opening speech, said:

The Senate took up the bill and acted upon it during the last Congress and sent it to the House; it was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and received as careful attention as I have ever known a committee to bestow on any measure.

* * * * * * *

We proceeded with great deliberation to go over the bill not only section by section, but line by line, and word by word; the bill has not received the same elaborate consideration from the Committee on Coinage of this House, but the attention of each member was brought to it at the earliest day of this session; each member procured a copy of the bill and there has been a thorough examination of the bill again.—Congressional Globe, volume 100, page 322.

Mr. KELLEY on the same day also said:

There are one or two things in this bill, I will say to the gentleman from New York with his permission, which I personally would like to modify: that is to say, I would like to follow the example of England and make a wide difference between our silver and gold coinage. * * *

I would have liked to have made the gold dollar uniform with the French system of weights, taking the gram as a unit. (Page 323, volume 100.)

On January 10, 1872, the bill after considerable discussion was again recommitted, and on February 9, 1872, it was again reported from the Coinage Committee by Hon. Samuel Hooper, printed and recommitted, and on February 13, 1872, reported back by Mr. Hooper with amendments, printed, and made the special order for March 12, 1872, until disposed of.

On April 9, 1872, the bill came up in the House for consideration. Mr. Hooper, in a carefully prepared speech of ten columns, explained the provisions of each section of the bill. In this speech (page 2306, volume 102, of the Congressional Globe) he says:

Section 16 re-enacts the provisions of the existing laws defining the silver coins and their weights, respectively, except in relation to the silver dollar, which is reduced in weight from 412½ to 384 grains, thus making it a subsidiary coin in harmony with the silver coins of less denomination to secure its concurrent circulation with them. The silver dollar of 412½ grains, by reason of its bullion or intrinsic value being greater than its nominal value, long since ceased to be a coin of circulation, and is melted by manufacturers of silverware. It does not circulate now in commercial transactions with any country, and the convenience of these manufacturers in this respect can better be met by supplying small stamped bars of the same standard, avoiding the useless expense of coining the dollar for that purpose.

Mr. Stoughton, of the Coinage Committee, also made a speech of seven columns, in which he says:

The silver coins provided for are the dollar, 384 grains troy, the half-dollar, quarter dollar, and dime, of the value and weight of one-half, one-quarter, and one-tenth of the dollar, respectively; and they are made a legal tender for all sums not exceeding $5 at any one payment. The silver dollar, as now issued, is worth for bullion three and one-fourth cents more than the gold dollar and seven and one-fourth cents more than two half dollars; having a greater intrinsic and nominal value, it is certain to be withdrawn from circulation whenever we return to specie payment, and to be used only for manufacture and exportation as bullion.

Mr. Potter, in commenting upon the bill, says:

Mr. Speaker, this is a bill of importance. When it was before the House in the early part of this session I took some objections to it which I am inclined now to think, in view of all the circumstances, were not entirely well founded, but after further reflection I am still convinced that it is a measure which it is hardly worth while for us to adopt at this time. * * * This bill provides for the making of changes in the legal-tender coin of the country and for substituting as legal tender coin of only one metal instead as heretofore of two. I think myself this would be a wise provision, and that legal-tender coins, except subsidiary coin, should be of gold alone; but why should we legislate on this now when we are not using either of those metals as a circulating medium?

The bill provides also for a change in respect of the weight and value of the silver dollar, which I think is a subject which, when we come to require legislation about it at all, will demand at our hands very serious consideration, and which, as we are not using such coins for circulation now, seems at this time to be an unnecessary subject about which to legislate. (Page 2310, volume 102.)

Mr. KELLEY also said:

I wish to ask the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. POTTER] if he knows of any government in the world which makes its subsidiary coinage of full value. The silver coin of England is 10 per cent. below the value of gold coin, and, acting under the advice of the experts of this country and of England and France, Japan has made her silver coinage within the last year 12 per cent. below the value of gold coin, and for this reason: It is impossible to retain the double standard. The values of gold and silver continually fluctuate. You cannot determine this year what will be the relative values of gold and silver next year. They were 15 to 1 a short time ago; they are 16 to 1 now.

Hence all experience has shown that you must have one standard coin which shall be a legal tender for all others, and then you may promote your domestic convenience by having a subsidary coinage of silver, which shall circulate in all parts of your country as legal tender for a limited amount and be redeemable at its face value by your Government. But, sir, I again call the attention of the House to the fact that the gentlemen who oppose this bill insist upon maintaining a silver dollar worth three and one-half cents more than the gold dollar and worth seven cents more than two half dollars, and that so long as those provisions remain you cannot keep silver coin in the country.

On May 27, 1872, the bill was again called up by Mr. Hooper, for the purpose of offering an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and the bill, as amended, passed that day—yeas 110, nays 13.

Just previous to the passage of the bill Mr. McNeely, of the Coinage Committee, said:

As a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, having carefully examined every section and line of this bill, and generally understanding the subject before us, I am satisfied that the bill ought to pass. (Page 3883, volume 104.)

The substitute reported by Mr. Hooper and passed by the House, so far as it refers to silver coinage, was identical with the bill previously reported from the Coinage Committee by him. It was also identical with the bill introduced by Mr. KELLEY, with the single exception of the provision authorizing the coinage of a silver dollar weighing 384 grains. The bill of Mr. KELLEY, so far as it related to the silver coinage, was identical with the bill which was prepared at the Treasury Department, and which had passed the Senate, excepting that the latter bill made the silver coin a legal tender for all sums less than $1, while the bill of Mr. KELLEY made the silver coins a legal tender for $5 in any one payment.

The bill was again printed in the Senate on May 29, 1872, and referred to the Finance Committee. Senator SHERMAN in reporting it back on December 16, 1872, said:

This bill has, in substance, passed both Houses, except that the Senate bill enlarged and increased the salaries of the officers of the Mint; it was passed by the Senate at the session of the last Congress, went to the House, and now somewhat modified has passed the House at this Congress, so that the bill has practically passed both Houses of Congress. The Senate Committee on Finance propose a modification of only a single section; but as this is not the same Congress that passed the bill in the Senate, I suppose it will have to go through the form of a full reading unless the Senate are willing to take it on the statement of the committee, the Senate already having debated it and passed it. (Page 203, volume 106, third session Forty-second Congress.)

After further debate, on motion of Mr. Cole, the bill was printed in full with amendments.

On January 7, 1873, it was again reported with amendments and again printed for the information of the Senate. It passed that body on January 17, 1873, after a discussion occupying nineteen columns of the Congressional Globe. In the course of the debate Senator SHERMAN said:

This bill proposes a silver coinage exactly the same as the French, and what are called the associated nations of Europe, who have adopted the international standard of silver coinage; that is, the dollar [two half dollars] provided for by this bill is the precise equivalent of a five-franc piece. It contains the same number of gram of silver, and we have adopted the international gram instead of the grain for the standard of our silver coinage. The trade-dollar has been adopted mainly for the benefit of the people of California and others engaged in trade with China.

That is the only coin measured by the grain instead of by the gram. The intrinsic value of each is to be stamped upon the coin. The Chamber of Commerce of New York recommended this change, and it has been adopted, I believe, by all the learned societies who have given attention to coinage, and has been recommended to us, I believe, as the general desire. That is embodied in these three or four sections of amendment to make our silver coinage correspond in exact form and dimensions and shape and stamp with the coinage of the associated nations of Europe, who have adopted an international silver coinage. (Page 672, volume 106, third session Forty-second Congress.)

The bill was sent to the House, and on January 21, 1873, on motion of Mr. Hooper, it was again printed with amendments, and subsequently committees of conference were appointed, consisting of Messrs. Hooper, Houghton, and McNeely of the House, and Senators SHERMAN, Scott, and BAYARD of the Senate. The reports of the committees of conference were agreed to, and the bill became a law on February 12, 1873, substantially as originally prepared at the Treasury.

The bill as prepared at the Treasury omitted the silver-dollar piece, and the report stated the fact of its omission three different times and gave the reasons therefor. The silver-dollar piece was omitted from the bill as it first passed the Senate. It was also omitted from the bills reported by Mr. KELLEY; but in the bills reported by Mr. Hooper a new silver dollar was proposed equal in weight (384 grains) to two of the half dollars then authorized.

The Senate substituted a trade-dollar weighing 420 grains in place of the dollar of 384 grains, in accordance with the wishes of the dealers in bullion upon the Pacific coast, that being considered by them as the most advantageous weight for a coin to be used for shipment to China and Japan.

The weight of the subsidiary silver coin was increased about ½ per cent. in value, making the half dollar, quarter dollar, and dime, respectively, of the weight of 12½ grams, 6¼ grams, and 2½ grams, or precisely one-half, one-quarter, and one-tenth, respectively, of the weight of the French five-franc piece. All of said coins were made a legal tender in nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment. The bill was read in full in the Senate several times and the record states on January 9, 1872, that it was read in the House. It was undoubtedly read at other times. The bill was printed separately eleven times and twice in reports made by the deputy comptroller of the currency, thirteen times in all by order of Congress. It was considered at length by the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Coinage Committee of the House during five different sessions, and the debates upon the bill in the Senate occupied sixty-six columns of the Globe and in the House seventy-eight columns of the Globe.

The Secretary of the Treasury called the special attention of Congress to the bill in his annual reports for 1870, 1871, and 1872. In his report of 1872, he says:

In the last ten years the commercial value of silver has depreciated about 3 per cent. as compared with gold, and its use as a currency has been discontinued by Germany and by some other countries. The financial condition of the United States has prevented the use of silver as currency for more than ten years, and I am of opinion that upon grounds of public policy no attempt should be made to introduce it, but that the coinage should be limited to commercial purposes, and designed exclusively for commercial uses with other nations.

The intrinsic value of a metallic currency should correspond to its commercial value, or metal should be used for the coinage of tokens redeemable by the Government at their nominal value. As the depreciation of silver is likely to continue, it is impossible to issue coin redeemable in gold without ultimate loss to the Government; for when the difference becomes considerable the holders will present the silver for redemption and leave it in the hands of the Government, to be disposed of subsequently at a loss.

Therefore, in renewing the recommendations heretofore made for the passage of the mint bill, I suggest such alterations as will prohibit the coinage of silver for circulation in this country, but that authority be given for the coinage of a silver dollar that shall be as valuable as the Mexican dollar, and to be furnished at its actual cost.

As a final answer to the charge that the bill was passed surreptitiously, I append, first, a copy of the section in reference to the issue of silver coins as printed in the report of the Treasury Department, and as passed by the Senate; second, a copy of the section as reported by Mr. KELLEY; third, a copy of the section as reported by Mr. Hooper; fourth, a copy of the section as finally passed by the Senate and agreed upon by the conference committee.

The following section was printed in the two reports of John Jay Knox, deputy comptroller of the currency, to Congress; also in Senate bill 859, Forty-first Congress, second session, April 28, 1870; in Senate bill 859, December 19, 1870, and January 11, 1871, third session, Forty-first Congress, as reported by Mr. SHERMAN:

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That of the silver coins, the weight of the half dollar, or piece of fifty cents, shall be 192 grains; and that of the quarter dollar and dime shall be, respectively, one-half and one-fifth of the weight of said half dollars; that the silver coin issued in conformity with the above section shall be a legal tender in any one payment of debts for all sums less than $1.

The following section was printed in Senate bill 859, Forty-first Congress, third session, February 25, 1871; and House bill No. 5, Forty-second Congress, first session, March 9, 1871, as reported by Mr. KELLEY:

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That of the silver coins, the weight of the half dollar, or piece of fifty cents, shall be 192 grains; and the quarter dollar and dime shall be, respectively, one-half and one-fifth of the weight of said half dollar; which coins shall be a legal tender, at their denominational value, for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

The following section was printed in House bill No. 2934, May 29, 1872; House bill No. 1427, February 9, 1872, and February 13, 1872, Forty-second Congress, second session, as reported by Mr. Hooper:

SEC. 16. That the silver coins of the United States shall be a dollar, a half dollar or fifty-cent piece, a quarter dollar or twenty-five-cent piece, and a dime or ten-cent piece; and the weight of the dollar shall be 384 grains; the half dollar, quarter dollar, and the dime shall be, respectively, one-half, one-quarter, and one-tenth of the weight of said dollar; which coins shall be a legal tender, at their denominational value, for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

The following section was printed in House bill No. 2934, December 16, 1872, January 7, 1873, and January 21, 1873, Forty-second Congress, third session, as reported by Mr. SHERMAN:

That the silver coins of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, a half dollar or fifty-cent piece, a quarter dollar or twenty-five-cent piece, a dime or ten-cent piece; and the weight of the trade-dollar shall be 420 grains troy; the weight of the half dollar shall be 12½ grains; the quarter dollar and the dime shall be, respectively, one-half and one-fifth of the weight of said half dollar; and said coins shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

The following section was contained in all of the different bills and the coinage act of 1873:

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That no coins, either of gold, silver, or minor coinage, shall hereafter be issued from the Mint other than those of the denominations, standards, and weights herein set forth.

Copies of the different bills may be obtained at the document-room of the Senate.

River and Harbor Bill and Democratic Reform.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN D. WHITE,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 10, 1876.

On the river and harbor bill and democratic reform.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, after long waiting we now come to the final vote on the passage of the river and harbor appropriation bill.

We are asked to adopt without discussion and without debate, or without the poor privilege of offering any amendments, the report on this bill as agreed upon by the conferees of the Senate and House of Representatives.

We were told when this bill was first presented to the House by our own Committee on Commerce that we had better pass it at once and let it go to the Senate so as to save time. Not wishing to appear as opposed to the principle of appropriating money for internal improvements, I voted on that occasion for the bill.

But, sir, now that it is complete, and we must either adopt or reject it in its present form, I shall not hesitate to vote against it.

I am not one of those who believe it to be unconstitutional to make appropriations for internal improvements. On the contrary, I believe in and would favor a proposition that would have for its object the building of great thoroughfares from the East to the West, so as to furnish cheap transportation, both by rail and by water, between remote sections of our country.

The third paragraph of section 8, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States declares that Congress shall have power—

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States and with the Indian tribes.

In addition to this Congress is given power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the power "to regulate commerce among the several States."

Since the United States first entered upon a scheme of internal improvements by appropriating money out of its revenue for the construction of the Cumberland turnpike road there have been hundreds of millions of dollars of the public moneys and many millions of acres of the public lands appropriated for making surveys, improving rivers and harbors, and the building of railways and canals in various parts of the Union. And I do not complain of what has been done in the past.

But it occurs to me that it is worth our while to consider this proposition, namely, are we doing the fair thing by all sections of the country? Not whether we are making a pro rata distribution for improvements of local importance; but whether we are not developing one State or a number of States to the injury and neglect of other States.

It will not be denied that up to the present time the millions of the money which has been appropriated "for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of public works on rivers and harbors and for other purposes" have gone to the East, the North, and the Northwest, while only the hundreds and thousands have gone to the West and the South.

What has developed Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, and Kansas? Land grants to railroads, to the public schools, and money appropriated for improving their rivers and harbors. So rapidly have the North and Northwest grown in population, in wealth, and all that constitutes prosperity and greatness, and so slow has been the progress of the West and South, that the attractions of the latter, as to climate, soil, and varied resources have been overlooked and the advantages of the former have been overestimated.

Look at Kentucky and Tennessee. There are no richer States than they in natural resources in the Union. Yet they advance so slowly in population and wealth, and consequently in education, that they seem to stand still so far are they behind their progressive neighbors.

We are naturally led to inquire, What is the cause of such a state of things? And in looking about for an answer I have come to the conclusion that Congress is largely to blame for it. Congress is responsible in this, that it has done little or nothing to build us up, and it has done much to pull us back and check our progress. It is undoubtedly true that the institution of slavery discouraged immigration that might have been attracted to the grand old Commonwealth of Kentucky. And the unsettled state of affairs consequent upon its abolition has been quite as effectual in preventing immigration to our borders.

The class legislation which has characterized the administration of State affairs by the party in power in my State has not made the most favorable impression on immigrants. Take for example the legislation which permits, sanctions, and so controls affairs that hundreds and thousands of its citizens can receive no education at all, as is the case in my State. What impression must this fact alone make on the mind of a man seeking a home among strangers!

I clip the following from the American Citizen, a newspaper edited and published at Lexington, Kentucky, by colored gentlemen:

According to the laws of Kentucky no colored man is qualified for a juror.

Colored men are taxed $1 a head more than white men.

Colored citizens have no voice in electing their school trustees.

The school age of colored children is from six to sixteen, of white children from six to twenty.

Taking into account this disparity as to the school age, the State appropriation for colored schools is less than one-eighth as much per scholar as for white schools.

The colored voters of Kentucky will be interested in the success of any political party which will earnestly set itself against these wrongs, but they acknowledge no obligation to any party which by silence makes itself responsible for these outrages upon their race.

Now, it is not in the interest of mixed schools that the above wrongs are enumerated. Not at all. Neither the whites nor the blacks either hope for or desire mixed schools. But they both complain that they have not better schools for their children, and especially is their complaint on account of the great discrimination made on account of race and color in the collection and distribution of the school funds.

So great is the illiteracy of the people in certain States of the Union that the Committee on Education and Labor to which I belong has reported a bill to set aside the public lands for educational purposes and providing that the proceeds of the sales of those lands shall be distributed among the States on the basis of the illiteracy of the people. If this bill should become a law, as we confidently trust it may at the next session of Congress, it will do much to make the school fund for the colored people of my State equal to that of the whites, for there is a statutory provision which declares that all moneys received from the United States for educational purposes shall go to the colored school fund till it equals that for the whites.

MURDERS AND KU-KLUX OUTRAGES.

Another cause for the lack of immigration to my State, and some other States as well, is to be found in the fact that too little regard is had for the lives and liberties of individuals.

The number of homicides, murders, and assassinations is fearful to contemplate. I hang my head in shame to confess that the number of such outrageous violations of the law and horrifying crimes in my State is probably not overestimated by the democratic editor who makes the following statement:

A BAD PICTURE FOR KENTUCKY.

During the last sixteen years there have been, so far as we remember, eighteen homicides in Mason County, Only one man, Collins, who butchered the Cobb family, was punished for his crime. Bloody as this record seems, it is less so than that of any other county in the State of equal population. It is safe to say that, since the war, there have been three thousand homicides in Kentucky and the hangings have been scarcely 1 per cent. of the number of murderers.—Maysville Eagle, [democrat,] Kentucky.

Almost as soon as the democratic party declared for Tilden and reform the ku-klux element of that party began their ancient practices, which are set forth in the following articles:

AN ENTHUSIASTIC REFORM DEMONSTRATION AT LANCASTER, KENTUCKY.

[Correspondence Louisville Commercial.]

STANDFORD, KENTUCKY, June 30.

A mob, composed of the good democracy of the enlightened blue-grass region of Kentucky, visited the jail of Lancaster, Kentucky, this morning, and released one Samuel Williams, a white man who had committed a deliberate and cold-blooded murder in Casey County a few weeks since. Then, on the spur of the moment, the same party of reform hung a negro who had killed Fred. Zakey during the Lancaster riot last summer. He had been tried and aquitted, but was afterward rearrested and placed in jail to be hung by this mob.

The party passed through here about four a. m. This is surely a glorious beginning for the party of reform.

JUSTICE.

DEMOCRATIC REFORM.

The democracy in Kentucky have commenced their work of reform, about which we hear so much noise. They took from the Lancaster jail one night last week a negro, who was incarcerated for an offense for which he had been once tried and acquitted upon testimony, and hanged him. They, at the same time, took from the same jail a cold-blooded murderer who, having been denied bail on his examining trial, was sent to that point from Russell County for safe-keeping. He was escorted away in a buggy by his K. K. brethren.—Mountain Echo, London, Kentucky.

This is democratic reform of the same kind that disgraced Kentucky in such a fearful manner a few years ago, and of which the following was a sample:

A COLORED MAN AND HIS WIFE KU-KLUXED FOR OBTAINING POSSESSION BY LAW OF THEIR CHILDREN ILLEGALLY BOUND TO SERVITUDE.

A correspondent in Todd County sends us the following: On Tuesday night, June 30, a party of fifteen or twenty disguised men went to the residence of Joel D. McCormic, of Todd County, broke into a house occcupied by a colored man, Isham Link and his wife, and with dire threats and drawn pistols took possession of Isham and his wife. His wife ran out at the door next to the residence of McCormic. Three or four men followed her, knocked her down, and stamped her. Her cries aroused Mr. McCormic, who ran out, and seeing the difficulty called to his wife for his pistol, when the cowardly scoundrels fled. The other part of the band took Isham some distance from the house, stripped him to the skin, and nine of them whipped him till they were satisfied; then told him they were coming again, whip his wife severely, then kill her, and give him another light brushing nd let him off.

Some of the parties are known and will be prosecuted to the extent of the law. This ku-kluxing has no political significance, but it is necessary to administer now and then some such chastisement to the colored people, especially those who are impudent (!) enough to attempt to assert their rights in a court of law, in order to keep them subdued and enslaved by terror. This difficulty evidently grew out of a couple of suits Isham's wife had with E G. and John Wood for the possession of a couple of her children, who were illegally bound to E. G. Wood. The orders binding them were so manifestly illegal that Wood made no defense, but was on hand with an armed mob, with which by force he took the children from their mother upon the public square immediately after the county court had set aside the orders binding them and took one of them to Christian County. The mother employed an attorney in Elkton, obtained a writ of habeas corpus, and got possession of the one left in Todd, which very much incensed the Woods; hence the ku-kluxing. Such outrages will continue to be perpetrated in Kentucky until there is created a public sentiment that will bring such cowardly miscreants and scoundrels to justice or drive them from the State.

Here is another outrage worthy of the most blood-thirsty villains who ever lived. It is taken from the Cynthiana (Kentucky) News (democratic) of June 11, 1874:

OUTRAGEOUS MURDER BY THE KU-KLUX.

On last Friday night, June 5, 1874, at the residence of S. C. Rankin, esq., on Harrison Creek, in the northern portion of Harrison County, a most outrageous and high-handed murder was committed.

A young man named Robert Becket, aged about twenty-three years, has been engaged with Squire Rankin for several years as a farm-hand. On the night of the 5th instant the squire was absent from his home, and no person was there except his family and Robert Becket.

The strangest part of this affair is that Robert Becket was in bed with Samuel Rankin, jr., a young man some fourteen or fifteen years of age, and was taken or called from that bed and carried some one hundred and fifty or two hundred yards from the house, without being discovered by young Rankin or any other members of the family, and found dead the next morning at sunrise, with a rope around his neck, his shirt burned off, (the only apparel on his person,) and seven bullet-holes through his body, two shots through his body opposite his heart, two through his back, and three in the back of his head.

Coroner Whitaker held an inquest over the body of Robert Becket, and made a full investigation of the horrible affair, but could find no clew to the perpetrators, except that near the body of the deceased was found the uniform of the Ku-Klux, to wit, three masks, one old hat, and a club on which was smeared clots of blood. It will be remembered that some two years ago, in this same neighborhood, Robert Becket was charged with killing Samuel Ellis, and ran away at the time, but returned and gave himself up, and was under bonds to appear at the next term of the criminal court.

Let us remark right here that Mr. Becket since his return has been a sober, industrious man.

It is just such "reform" as this that the nomination of Tilden and Hendricks encourages, and it is just such disgraceful and murderous reform as the above that the election of Tilden and Hendricks in November would saddle upon the South.

I suppose that every person has read the newspaper account of the hauling down of the national flag at Carlisle, Kentucky, on the 4th of July last.

I have a private letter concerning that disgraceful manifestation of unwhipped treason:

CARLISLE, KENTUCKY, July 13, 1876.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 7th instant, making inquiry concerning a disreputable transaction which occurred here on Monday night, the 3d instant, came to hand two or three days ago. Circumstances over which I had no control, I regret to say, have prevented an earlier answer. The facts in the case of which you speak and referred to above are as follows: On Monday night the 3d instant the jailer of this county and the constable of this precinct, assisted by four or five others of less note, procured material and had a large rebel flag made which they intended to hoist that night in order that it might float to the breeze on the 4th; but the matter coming to the ears of a few considerate democrats, they set about to prevent the hoisting of such an emblem of treason and denounced the project in unmeasured terms, and finally succeeded in dissuading the gang from such a scandalous act. But the gallant jailer and his party, not to be outdone, at once determined that the United States flag, the Stars and Stripes, which had been suspended during the day to a cord across the street attached to the top of the business house of Adair and Mrs. Brewington on one side and to that of Peale & Co. on the other, must and should come down; and with that object in view one or two of the party, the patriotic jailer being one, went to the residence of Mrs. Brewington, (who was formerly the widow of the late Colonel Metcalfe,) some two hundred yards from their business house, and aroused her and her husband at the hour of midnight, and informed them that to keep peace and save trouble they had better come down and take down that flag, else it would be torn down or shot down. Accordingly Brewington and wife came down, and then the gallant jailer aforesaid went up on the top of Peale & Co.'s house, untied the cord, and let the flag fall, while Brewington, on top of his or his wife's house, pulled the flag in. The foregoing are the facts in a condensed form. The pretext was, and it was only a pretext, that the flag was once the private property of the late Colonel Metcalfe. Colonel Metcalfe was in the Union Army during the two first years of the war. He was the first commander of the Seventh Kentucky Cavalry, and died after the close of the war in Cincinnati.

Truly, yours,

TO HON. JNO. D. WHITE.

I suppress the name of the author of the communication for prudential reasons.

But while I admit, Mr. Speaker, that such outrages as I have referred to above have much to do with retarding our progress, which must come, if it comes at all, by encouraging capital and skilled labor to emigrate to our State and develop its mineral, timber, and agricultural resources, I desire to call attention to that most important of all the facts, so far as Kentucky is concerned, which bears on this question, namely, that we have been neglected by the General Government.

Now the case may be stated as follows: We are a poor people, yet possessed of such a variety of natural resources that we could be a rich and powerful people if we but had cheap transportation to the Atlantic seaboard.

Thirty-odd years ago there was a survey made for a railroad from Charleston, South Carolina, through Kentucky, to Cincinnati, Ohio. Ever since then our people have lived in hope that some such enterprise would be successful. But the undertaking is a large one for a private corporation unless aided by the General Government.

I was highly gratified when, on 20th June last, Mr. HAYMOND, of Indiana, introduced a bill to charter "the United States Central Railway Company," to build a railroad from Chicago to the Atlantic seaboard.

It is the successful termination of such a great work as this that is to make Kentucky the Pennsylvania of the West. It is such works of internal improvement as this which will build up the South, by inducing immigration, skilled labor, and capital to till the soil, start manufactories, and develop the various resources of the State.

I quote the second section of Mr. HAYMOND'S bill:

SEC. 2. That the purpose and object of said company are hereby declared to be to locate, lay out, build, operate, own, enjoy, and maintain a railway, with one or more tracks of uniform gauge throughout, together with all the necessary appurtenances essential to a first-class passenger and freight railway, including a telegraph-line along the entire length of said road and its branches, and to extend and construct said railway from the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, upon the most direct and eligible route consistent with the purposes of commerce and with regard to the cost of construction, to the southeast Atlantic seaboard; and the route of said railway to be continuous from Chicago, through Cook County in Illinois, to the boundary-line of the State of Indiana at or near Dyer in Lake County, Indiana; thence to Indianapolis; thence to the Ohio River; thence, by a bridge, over and across said river; thence into and through the State of Kentucky to Lexington or Frankfort; thence to London in Kentucky, or some point within twenty-five miles of it; thence, by either or both of two routes, first, by a route from London, Kentucky, or said point near it, to Cumberland Gap; thence to Morristown in the State of Tennessee; thence to Asheville, North Carolina; thence to Spartanburgh, South Carolina; thence to Charleston, with the privilege of a branch from some point on the said line between Spartanburgh and Charleston to Port Royal, South Carolina, or Savanah, Georgia, or to both of them; or, at the option of the said company, by the other route, from London, Kentucky, or the aforesaid point near it, to Knoxville, Tennessee; thence to Augusta, Georgia; thence to Port Royal, with the privilege of branches from this line to Charleston and Savannah; and the said company is hereby empowered and authorized to select and adopt its route or routes and construct its said railway on either or both of the before-mentioned routes from London in the State of Kentucky, or the point near London, to the southeast Atlantic seaboard, together with any or all their respective subsidiary branches, and to make such connections as the necessities of commerce may require at the harbors of Charleston, Port Royal, and Savannah; and the said company is further authorized and empowered to construct a branch from some point on the main line in Kentucky, or from Knoxville, Tennessee, to Saint Louis in the State of Missouri.

Not less in importance to my State would be the construction of a canal-route from the Kentucky River to the Atlantic seaboard. I introduced a bill to have such a route surveyed, believing that a survey of it would demonstrate its feasibility and importance and ultimately lead to its construction.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to have surveys and examinations made of the following-named rivers and creeks, to wit, the South Fork of Kentucky River, Richland Creek, Cumberland River, Yellow Creek, and Powell's, Tennessee, Hiawassee, and Savannah Rivers, for the purpose of ascertaining the feasibility of a canal and slack-water cheap-transportation route from the confluence of the Three Forks of the Kentucky River (through Cumberland Gap) to the sea at Savannah, Georgia; and that the sum of $20,000 is hereby appropriated for that purpose.

This route was included in the list of surveys embraced in the river and harbor bill as reported by the Senate Committee. But the amount appropriated for surveys in the present bill and which we are asked to pass is so small that my canal-route like several other important surveys will, I fear, go by the board.

It may not be useless, however, for me to quote what Professor N. S. Shaler, of Harvard College, and State geologist for Kentucky, has said of this proposed water-route:

In considering the capacities of Kentucky for the production of wealth, too much importance cannot be attached to its natural water-ways. The great market for its heavy products will always be along the waters of the Mississippi River system; and it is our peculiar fortune that there are half a dozen rivers in the State which reach far up into the mineral districts, and only require the measure of improvement that can be given them at small cost to become the most perfect mineral roads known to art. It is a fact beyond contesting that water transportation is, and from its nature must always remain, the cheapest form of carriage for heavy products. Railways will serve for purposes of local supply of coal, iron, and timber within our borders, and along the future routes that lead toward the sea; but in the struggle for the markets of the Mississippi Valley, the great economic battle, in which the prize is imperial wealth, success will be won by the use of the cheapest transportation. A glance at the maps used by the survey to indicate the river basins, and the possible slack-water navigation of the State within the mineral districts, will make it plain that the Kentucky River penetrates a greater distance into the eastern coal and iron district than any other stream within the control of this Commonwealth. Its waters susceptible of improvement will give, when they are made navigable, a coal and iron frontage of not far from eight hundred miles. This region will be more accessible to the Ohio River, as far as the barrier of lockage is concerned, than Central New York is to its metropolis by the Erie Canal. It will discharge its products within ready reach of the two great markets of the Ohio, Louisville and Cincinnati, and on its banks, within one hundred miles of the outlet of the Kentucky, it will command the markets of nearly a million of people. On the Lower Ohio and Mississippi it will have great advantages over the Pittsburgh products, in that the treacherous navigation of the Upper Ohio has been escaped, and the water is more uniformly of a navigable stage throughout the year.

Many years ago the Commonwealth made provision for a survey of an extension of the proposed slack-water navigation of the Kentucky River to Cumberland Gap, by way of the South Fork of that river and Goose Creek to the headwaters of Richland Creek, a tributary of the Cumberland, and thence by canal to the main stream of the Cumberland at the point where Pineville now stands. Then it was proposed to resume the slack-water navigation, and continue it by way of Yellow Creek to Cumberland Gap. Then by a tunnel of less than 1,400 feet through rocks that are easily penetrated, it was proposed to pass into the valley of Eastern Tennessee. A great spring at the gap promised water enough for lockage to lead the navigation into the valley of the Powell River, whence by easy gradients it would be possible to carry it through the whole of the great river system of the Upper Tennessee. By way of the Hiawassee River, by a short canal, it would be possible to extend this form of navigation through to the Savannah River, and thence to the sea.

After a careful study of the route from the Kentucky River to Cumberland Gap, it is evident that the project is entirely feasible, and likely to have a very great importance in the development of the mineral resources of this State, as well as of East Tennessee; and furthermore, that the cost of this water-way is likely to be exceedingly small when compared with the practical results likely to be obtained from its workings.

Considering area, accessibility, neighborhood to suitable coal and other advantages, the "dye-stone" ore of the Cumberland Mountain district is probably the lowest field of ore in the Mississippi Valley, and I believe will, when transportation is furnished, produce cheaper iron than any other ore in America. The coals to work this ore must, to a great extent, come from Kentucky. The ores from the coal series of rocks within our State would furnish a valuable basis for admixture with the "dye-stone" ore. If we could have a system of transportation as cheap as water-ways furnish from the Cumberland Mountain towards the Ohio River, it would give us a close hold on this great mineral district. Owing to the relation of the materials, the ores will always seek the coal, the limestone, and the facilities furnished by water-powers. The district of the Upper Cumberland and the Kentucky River would, I believe, become the seats of production of the iron from the "dye-stone" ore, rather than the region of East Tennessee.

As soon as this water navigation is carried to Cumberland Ford, it will be found possible, at small expense, to extend the slack-water up the Upper Cumberland to Poor and Clear Forks, and to some thirty miles or more beyond Harlan Court-house. This would render a great valley rich in coal and timber quite accessible. But for some such system it is likely to remain for a great time without any transportation facilities.

With this canal system carried to Cumberland Gap, its extension via the Powell, Tennessee, Hiawassee, and Savannah to the sea would be assured in time. I believe this to be one of the few practicable water-ways from the central region of the Mississippi to the sea. It would have the advantage over present northern water-routes of at least four months more navigation in the year.

Professor Shaler, in his report to the Kentucky State Legislature, January, 1876, says:

Nature has bestowed with lavish hand her gifts upon our State. Rich in all the elements of material greatness, possessing two extensive coal-fields, an abundance of iron ore of great variety and excellent quality, contiguous to coal and timber, with five rivers (the Tradewater, Green, Kentucky, Licking, and Big Sandy) leading from our coal, iron, and timber lands, through our rich agricultural regions, and capable of being made navigable at all seasons, thus giving to our State a larger water frontage of mineral lands than is possessed by any other country, and affording to our mines, manufactories, and farming lands direct water communication with thirteen of the largest and wealthiest of our sister States.

A careful observer, after an extended tour of observation through our State, writes: "There is no reason why Kentucky should not already have received a mighty current of immigration, excepting the negligence of her people with regard to their own interests." To convince ourselves of the truth of this, let us make comparison of our development with States of like natural advantages that have profited by these advantages by affording transportation facilities for the development of their resources. For this reason take Pennsylvania and Ohio, those States being about the size of Kentucky with near the same area of coal-fields, the advantages being in favor of the latter, as follows:

Ohio having	10,000 square miles of coal-fields.
Pennsylvania having	12,630 square miles of coal-fields.
Kentucky having	12,771 square miles of coal-fields.

In iron ores I believe the present geological survey of the State will develop the fact that our State has the advantage over either of those States. Our hard-wood timber, suitable for manufacturing purposes, is more abundant, and in timber suitable for charcoal, convenient to iron ores, we have a decided advantage. Our undeveloped water-power exceeds the water-power of those States. Yet with these natural advantages, what have we to show in actual production to compare with them?

The value of the products of mining industries in 1870 was:

In Kentucky	$500,945
In Ohio	7,751,544
In Pennsylvania	76,208,390

Our mineral districts are capable of supporting a denser population, yet there are less than five inhabitants to the square mile in the mining districts of Kentucky, while in Ohio there are from forty to seventy-five, and in Pennsylvania from forty-five to one hundred and twenty-five.

The distribution of wealth in the mining districts of the three States in 1870 was:

In Kentucky less than	$300	per capita.
In Ohio from	750 to $1,250	per capita.
In Pennsylvania from	1,250 to 2,000	per capita.

Notwithstanding the superior quality and quantity of our hard-wood timber, the value of agricultural implements manufactured in 1870 was:

In Kentucky	$1,384,917
In Pennsylvania	3,652,295
In Ohio	11,907,366

I know from personal observation that we greatly surpass Ohio in timber suitable for hubs, spokes, fellies, &c.; yet Kentucky manufactured thirty-eight thousand two hundred and thirty-two dollars' worth, and Ohio manufactured one million seven hundred and twelve thousand eight hundred and eight dollars' worth.

Most of the raw cotton passes the entire length of our State on the way to Pennsylvania, yet the value of cotton goods manufactured in the two States was, in 1870:

In Kentucky	$498,960
In Pennsylvania	17,490,080

Our water-power is greater, yet the following table is instructive:

	No. of wheels.	Horse-power.
Kentucky	459	7,640
Ohio	2,157	44,746
Pennsylvania	7,603	141,982

Notwithstanding the extent of our coal-fields and the facilities which a judicious expenditure would afford for getting our coal to market, and use it in profitable home-manufacturing industries, in 1872—

	Tons.
Kentucky mined	340,000
Ohio mined	3,000,000
Pennsylvania mined	29,442,000

The reason for these great differences is that Kentucky has practically ignored the existence of her great natural advantages and mineral wealth, and has as it were permitted a Chinese wall to hedge in the richest portion of her domain, while Ohio and Pennsylvania, by affording canal and railroad facilities to their mines and manufactories, have made rapid advancement in material wealth.

The salt wells on the Upper Kentucky River could supply the South and West with that indispensable article, yet not one bushel finds its way to the Ohio River. Should the canal connecting the Cumberland with the Kentucky be built, the tonnage of salt going South would be immense.

Below the forks of the Kentucky River there is a good hydraulic limestone of quite an extended area. This would not only cheapen the cost of the locks and dams on the river, but a large amount could be manufactured for market after the river is improved.

I have briefly as I could referred to some of the best known undeveloped resources of the Upper Kentucky and Upper Cumberland region. With development of these, many hidden sources of wealth will be brought to light. The agricultural capabilities of this region are much greater than they are supposed to be by persons unfamiliar with them. Now the farmer can raise nothing—owing to the impossibilities of transportation—which he can haul to market and sell at a profit. The few roads have gone to utter ruin since the war. I doubt if a loaded wagon could pass through many of these counties. The improvement of our natural water-ways will not only open up these counties, but will benefit the entire agricultural interests of our State. The agricultural prosperity of China, the Netherlands, and England is mainly due to the cheap water communication afforded by their canals.

As the Kentucky River is the largest river in the State, and the one the improvement of which will open up the largest undeveloped district, besides affording facilities for the interchange of products between twenty-four counties of the Commonwealth, I have been at some pains to collect facts respecting the resources of the country adjacent to it and the means by which it may be made navigable. From the imperfect records now extant of the old surveys made under the direction of the board of internal improvement and the recent researches of the State geological survey, I am enabled to collect the following facts:

From the mouth of the Kentucky River to the Three Forks the distance is 257½ miles, with a total ascent of 212 feet. There are completed five locks, affording navigation to the first 96 miles, leaving 161½ miles to be completed. From the Three Forks to mouth of Troublesome Creek is 55 miles, with a raise of 39 feet. The cost of slack-water navigation from the head of navigation at lock No. 5 to mouth of Troublesome Creek would be $1,275,000, or about $6,000 per mile. This would be at the rate of $6,209 per mile to Three Forks and $5,000 per mile from there to mouth of Troublesome Creek. Contracts were made at this rate in 1870, and I am informed by the contractors that it could be done for less now.

The following table will show the feasibility of this plan and the advantages of this river:

Object.	Length, miles.	Lockage, feet.	Width of channel, feet.	Total cost.	Cost per mile.
Kentucky River to mouth of Troublesome Creek	312½	296	250	*$1,275,000	$5,902
Erie Canal	350	689	70	43,639,324	124,683
Delaware and Hudson Canal	108	1,073	48	6,339,210	60,200
Lehigh Canal	46	361	60	4,455,000	51,208
Ohio Canal	308	1,207	40	3,225,684	10,473

* This does not include the work done on the lower part of the river

The improvement of the Kentucky River will cost less, the lockage is less, and the width is greatest. Some of these canals are troubled for supply of water at the summit in summer. The Kentucky River at lowest water in summer runs 20,000 cubic feet of water per minute below the forks and 8,000 cubic feet per minute above the forks, affording not only ample supply for navigation, but a large water power surplus for manufacturing purposes.

From the mouth of South Fork to the salt-works above Manchester it is 68½ miles, with a raise of 206½ feet. The estimated cost of slack-water improvement to the salt-works—giving a channel from 150 to 200 feet wide—is $411,000. At the lowest stage there are only 393 cubic feet per minute of water in South Fork, hardly enough for slack-water navigation; but a cheap system of reservoirs could be constructed so that an ample supply could be assured at all seasons. This brings us to another important subject; the feasibility and utility of a canal connecting the Cumberland and Kentucky Rivers.

I have not space to go into the details of the survey, but it was demonstrated that it could be easily and cheaply accomplished.

The Cumberland River at Barbourville is 121.8 feet higher than the waters of the Kentucky River at the Goose Creek salt-works. The summit divide between the head of Richland Creek (emptying at Barbourville) and Collins's Fork of Goose Creek is 78 feet higher than low water at Barbourville and less than a mile through. A dam 25 feet at Barbourville and a cut at the summit less than a mile long, 53 feet deep in the center and lessening at the ends, will let the waters of the Cumberland flow through, giving a channel six feet deep. This cut would be through shale, with no fixed rock. The amount of water taken from the Cumberland would be inconsiderable, as it would only flow through when boats were passing the locks, and the supply taken for the canal would be from the reserve held back by the dam at Barbourville and would not affect the river below that point. This dam at Barbourville would afford slack-water to Pineville, and from there, by way of Yellow Creek, slack-water could be carried to the foot of the Cumberland Mountains at Cumberland Gap. Mr. W. B. Page, of the United States Coast Survey, estimates the valley of Yellow Creek to be 1,100 feet above the sea, and as the mouth of the Kentucky River, at the Ohio, is 416 feet above the sea, the entire lockage from the mouth to Cumberland Gap would be 684 feet, or 5 feet less than the lockage on the Erie Canal.

The length of the canal from Barbourville to the Goose Creek salt-works would be 21½ miles.

At Cumberland Gap a tunnel about 800 yards long* and a canal 6 miles down the Gap Creek Valley to Powell's River will connect the entire river system of Tennessee and give thence a direct outlet through Kentucky for their products.

This would also connect with the proposed river and canal improvement, proposed by the United States Government, connecting the Tennessee River with the streams flowing into the Atlantic Ocean.

This measure I believe well worthy the attention of the State, as it is capable of producing more important results to the States of the Ohio Valley, as well as to the cotton States west of the Mississippi, than any other plan of internal improvement within my knowledge.

As bearing on the importance of the proposed canal route referred to above, I shall quote a few extracts from the report of the engineer who superintended the survey made of the Cumberland River in 1871.

In Executive Document No. 60, Forty-first Congress, page 50, he says:

The Cumberland River rises on the west slope of the Cumberland Mountains and in the northeast extremity of Harlan County, Kentucky. Its course is an eccentric; instead of taking a northwest direction, which would have been perpendicular to the course of the highlands and in conformity to the natural dip of the upper strata, its general course, from its head to its mouth, is semicircular. Approaching Nashville from the northwest with three large convolutions, two-thirds of the length of which are parallel with the Cumberland highlands, it turns northwest at Nashville and finally terminates its course in the Ohio River, near the mouth of the equally eccentric Tennessee, in nearly the same latitude as its source. The Cumberland Mountains, which separate the water-shed of the Cumberland from the valley of Tennessee, have at this point an altitude of 2,600 feet above the sea. Cumberland Gap is about 1,600 feet. With a rapid descent the river reaches the first bench of the highlands, and after a precipitous fall it flows with a more equable current among the subcarboniferous conglomerates of the highland plateau. Cutting its pathway through solid rock, it reaches in Whitley County, about ten miles below Williamsburgh, the great falls of the Cumberland, where the entire river is precipitated over the conglomerate with a vertical fall of 63 feet. Here, in a deep and rocky basin at the foot of the falls, it stops to rest before pursuing its rugged course. Here, too, the surveys and plans of improvement usually begin. Although the river above the falls might be made navigable for barges for 50 miles by the removal of the dams which obstruct its course, the falls present an almost insuperable barrier to further progress. The produce of this section of country finds an outlet by the railroad from Mount Vernon to Louisville. This road, when completed, will cross the Cumberland at Williamsburgh, Kentucky, and will extend to Knoxville.

* * * * * * *

The timber consists of white oak, beech, black, red, or post oak, cedar, walnut, poplar, and hickory, pawpaw, and grape vines. The red lithistration soils are nearly as productive as the river bottom. They are covered in the upper counties by black walnut, black oak, hickory, black gum, dogwood, and pawpaw.

Appreciating in some degree the necessity for improving so magnificent a river as the Upper Cumberland, before urging an appropriation to be made, I introduced the following bill:

*A mistake; the length of the tunnel would be 1,400 feet. C. J. N.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $7,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War for the survey of the Cumberland River above the Cumberland Falls, in the State of Kentucky.

In order to show that I have not overestimated its importance and the urgent necessity in the case, I desire to insert as a part of my remarks a petition signed by hundreds of my best constituents:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, citizens of —— county, Kentucky, state that there are millions on millions of dollars' worth of bituminous and cannel coal, iron, and, perhaps, other valuable minerals undeveloped in the counties of Pulaski, Whitley, Laurel, Rock Castle, Jackson, Knox, Bell, and Harlan, in Kentucky; that the walnut, cherry, poplar, oak, and hickory, of the various kinds, except live-oak, in said counties, is as fine and of as good quality as the world ever saw.

That the Cincinnati Southern Railroad runs through the western portion of Pulaski and Whitley Counties; that there is no early prospect of a railroad through the remaining portion of said counties; that the only natural outlet is by way of Cumberland River and its tributaries; that there are natural obstructions in said streams which ought to be removed; that the citizens living along said streams are not able pecuniarily to make the removals; that the constitution of Kentucky prohibits the Legislature of the State of Kentucky from making appropriations exceeding $100 for any such purpose. They therefore ask an appropriation at your hands of $—— for that purpose.

In the bill now under consideration there is only an appropriation for the Cumberland River below the falls.

But there is another river to which I desire to call the attention of the House, namely, the Big Sandy River.

In no sense can this river be called a "local concern." If we consider its principal tributary, the Louisa Fork, it cannot be said to be only of local importance, for it takes its rise in Virginia and gathers force enough to break through the Cumberland Mountains, and uniting with the Tug Fork to form Big Sandy River, it constitutes the dividing line between Kentucky and West Virginia. If the bowlders and snags and leaning trees were removed, it would be navigable almost to the Virginia line.

If we take the Tug Fork, it cannot be said to be only of local importance, for it divides Kentucky and West Virginia. And surely no one will for a moment contend that the main Big Sandy below the confluence of the Tug and Louisa Forks is not a river of national importance. But it has been regarded as such by the conference committee, who come before this House and ask us to pass this bill as a fair and just measure. I desire to know on what principle the committee came to the conclusion that it was fair and just to appropriate $20,000 for the improvement of the Upper Missouri River and could give nothing to the Big Sandy.

Where is the propriety of giving $145,000 to Washington Territory and Oregon and nothing to the Big Sandy River? Yes, $145,000 to 100,000 inhabitants in Oregon and Washington Territory, but nothing to 300,000 inhabitants in Virginia, West Virginia, and Kentucky. There are more people in my district alone than in the State of Oregon and Washington Territory both put together. There are more resources of wealth in my district alone than there are on the entire Pacific slope. The coal in my district is more valuable than all the gold of California; and the salt, the iron, and the inexhaustible supplies of the finest varieties of hard woods, together with its agricultural resources, make my district one of the richest in the whole country. What is true of my district is true in the main of the entire State of Kentucky. Yet, sir, with all this wealth we are poor, and why? Simply because Congress fritters away its appropriations on other and less deserving sections of the country.

I would like to know on what principle other than that of might, or a counting of noses, this conference committee has deemed it wise to give the lion's share of this $5,000,000 to Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, New York, and the Virginias? Where is the necessity, where is the excuse for such partiality for so many objects of local importance only in these singularly fortunate and favored States?

I had the honor to introduce the following bill:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and instructed to have surveys and examinations made of the Tug Fork of Big Sandy River from Warfield, in the State of Kentucky, to a point on said Tug Fork five miles above the "Roughs of Tug," the Tug Fork dividing in part the States of Kentucky and West Virginia; and that the sum of $—— is hereby appropriated for that purpose.

I shall insert just here a petition signed by a large number of the best farmers who live along this stream in the States of Kentucky and Virginia:

The petition of citizens of Kentucky and West Virginia to the Congress of the United States, praying for an appropriation to the Tug Fork of Big Sandy River.

Whereas the Tug Fork of Big Sandy River is the dividing line between Kentucky and West Virginia, and neither of these States assumes the right to make the small but needful improvements by removing rocks, snags, leaning trees, and other natural obstructions; and whereas the workable coals are convenient to the said Tug River for transportation, being found in thick strata and boundless quantities as well as of finest qualities; and whereas the supply of timber of the most marketable kinds, such as walnut, white oak, poplar, ash, locust, hickory, is without limit, the luxuriant growth rapidly replacing whatever may be cut off; and whereas there are natural obstructions in said Tug River which are a terror to shippers of coal and lumber on account of danger to life and property, and which should be removed by the General Government to the end that the people along said river may find an outlet for their products and the markets of the country receive the benefit of them; and whereas there has been a survey of said Tug River to Warfield, Kentucky, in which the water supply of said river is clearly shown and the fall per mile is declared to be slight: Therefore,

We, the citizens of West Virginia and Kentucky along the said river, do hereby humbly petition the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled to appropriate the sum of $40,000, to be appropriated to the removing of natural obstructions in the Tug Fork of Big Sandy River from Warfield, Kentucky, to the mouth of the Dry Fork of Tug River.

But, Mr. Speaker, to further satisfy the House that the Big Sandy River and its principal tributaries, the Louisa Fork and the Tug Fork, are deserving of great consideration, I shall read from the annual report of W. E. Merrill, made to the Chief of Engineers in 1875:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Cincinnati, Ohio, February 22, 1875.

COLONEL: I have the honor to submit the following report on the survey of the Big Sandy River. This stream is for convenience divided into three parts:

First. The Big Sandy River from Catlettsburgh to Louisa, Kentucky.
Second. The Louisa Fork from Louisa to Piketon, Kentucky.
Third. The Tug Fork from Louisa to Warfield, Kentucky.

BIG SANDY RIVER.

The Big Sandy River is formed by the confluence of the Louisa and the Tug Forks, twenty-six miles from its mouth, opposite the town of Louisa, Lawrence County, Kentucky, and it is the dividing line between the States of Kentucky and West Virginia.

LOUISA FORK.

The Louisa Fork is the principal branch of the Big Sandy River, and it rises beyond the Cumberland Mountains in the table-lands of the southwestern part of Virginia, at an elevation of fifteen hundred feet above tide-water. It flows, like the main river, in a northwesterly direction through a narrow valley. The fountain-head, being so far south, gives the river an advantage over northern streams in having but little ice, a feature of considerable importance to those interested in its navigation. In ascending the river the hills increase in height. In some places the banks are composed of rock; in others of sand and clay. Where they are of the latter material, the slopes are uniform. The bottom-lands, like those of the main river, are above ordinary high-water mark. There are many large bowlders in the river which have rolled from the bordering hills, and are obstructions which ought to be removed. The peculiar feature of this fork is the great number of rock-bars, which are doubtless due to the fact that its steep slope causes a velocity in the current so great as to prevent the sand from lodging. These rock-bars have only a few inches of water on them during low stages, while at the head and foot are pools varying in depth from six to twelve feet. The average fall from Piketon to Louisa, Kentucky is 1.49 feet per mile, and the average width is 200 feet. The number of inclining trees is 7,656, and the number of snags 3,397.

TUG FORK.

The Tug Fork rises in the mountains of McDowell County, West Virginia, and flows in a northwesterly direction, forming, with the Louisa Fork, the Big Sandy River. It has the same general features as the Louisa Fork. The hills come nearer the river, and consequently the bottom-lands are not so wide. This fork, as far up as the Falls of Tug, is shallow, crooked, and narrow; so shallow during low water as to render navigation impossible; but above the falls its character changes, and it becomes a succession of pools separated by rock-bars. The hills are very steep, exposing the rocky materials of which they are mostly composed. The banks are alternately of rock and of sand, but, when formed of the latter material, they have been but slightly cut away by the river on account of the protection afforded by trees and plants. The average width of this fork is 180 feet, and the average fall from Louisa to Warfield, Kentucky, is 1.75 feet per mile. The number of inclining trees is 2,822 and the number of snags is 801.

GENERAL REMARKS.

All these streams are fed almost entirely by mountain springs, which, when the branches near the mouth are dried up, continue their usual supply, and thus become the main sustenance of the river during low water. The Big Sandy River is the only outlet for a very productive country, rich in both agricultural and mineral wealth, yet it presents serious obstacles to the transportation of these productions to market. It is unnavigable in low water, and even in high water it is dangerous to navigation on account of its velocity and its sharp bends. On the Tug Fork these difficulties are increased by the number of leaning trees which project into the narrow channel

The mines that were formerly worked on these forks were located at points where the river is shallow, so that boats could not be loaded during low water and held for a rise. The want of proper landing-places and the disasters and resulting loss incurred in trying to get coal to market have compelled the abandonment of work on all the mines, except those that supply the limited local demand.

The following statistics of the Big Sandy Valley have been prepared by Judge M. J. Ferguson, of Louisa, and will give some idea of the exports of this section:

"This table, compiled for the year ending July 1, 1870, embraces only that portion of the valley which now finds its only outlet by the river to the different markets.

"Articles exported.

	Value.
Saw-logs, sawed lumber, and fencing-posts	$550,000
Staves and spoke-timber	80,000
Tan-bark	75,000
Keg-timber	8,000
Hoop-poles	25,000
Barges and small craft	45,000
Fruit	40,000
Feathers, bees-wax, ginseng, tallow, hides, poultry, eggs, butter, flax-seed, rags, and produce of country stores	165,000
Wheat and corn	50,000
Potatoes	6,000
Live stock	175,000
	1,219,000

"This estimate was made from memoranda collected from merchants, timber-dealers, and common carriers, and has been recently revised upon the following basis of values:

"The timber is valued at 12½ cents per cubic foot, and a fleet of saw-logs is estimated at an average value of $3,500 in the Cincinnati market, the tan-bark at $15 per cord, and the staves at $24 per thousand.

"Barges and other craft are valued at $2 per linear foot. The item $165,000 from country stores is ascertained by counting the number at 110 and their average export at $1,500. This is believed to be much under the true value. Previous to the year 1868, the corn and wheat produced were used almost entirely for home consumption, but since that time the export of these grains has steadily increased, until now the gross export would probably double the estimate in the above table.

"There has been much difficulty in estimating the value of live stock, and it is believed that this item is very low. The general exports of this valley have, since the year 1866, increased more than 25 per cent. annually, and some of the smaller products at a much greater rate.

"For example, in one county situated near the mouth of the river, the sale of eggs in the year 1866 did not exceed $1,000, while in the year 1870 it amounted to about $12,000. Any general improvement of the Big Sandy River would secure for it the exports that now go overland."

Judge Ferguson assured me that the exports for the year ending September 1, 1874, would not materially differ from those given in the above table, and that, although there would be changes in detail, the total would remain about the same. It is estimated that the steamboats and the push-boats carry 30,000 people and about 30,000 tons of freight annually up and down this river during the season of navigation. The census gives 80,000 as the population of those counties that use this valley as an outlet to market.

The steamboat Fleetwing, 117 feet in length and drawing 30 inches, navigates this river as far as Louisa during nine months, and as far as Piketon during five months in each year. The back-water of the Ohio River gives sufficient depth of water for navigation to some distance above Louisa.

The river was ganged during this survey with the following results: On the Louisa Fork, at low water, the discharge was found to be as follows: At Beck's Shoal, 32 6 cubic feet per second; near Big Shoal Branch, 60 07 cubic feet per second. On the Tug Fork, when the river was nearly at low water, but rising, the discharge near Lick Shoal was 138 cubic feet per second. The discharge of the Big Sandy River at its mouth was found to be 753.3 cubic feet per second, the river being near low water but rising. It was with the greatest difficulty that our boat, drawing only 5 inches, could get over the shoals and bars when descending the river between Piketon and Louisa. The Big Sandy and its branches drain an area of 4,600 square miles, equaling in extent about one-twelfth of the State of Kentucky. This river and its forks rise during certain seasons very suddenly, often to the height of 50 feet, and fall nearly as quickly. Each creek has a valley and bottom-lands, similar to those of the stream into which it empties, but correspondingly less in extent.

The hills are covered with dense forests of valuable timber, including walnut, ash, maple, poplar, oak, white walnut, chestnut, and yellow pine, which furnish the principal supply of wood to the steamboat-builders and furniture-makers of Cincinnati. This timber, the only considerable export, goes out at flood-time and gluts its own market, thereby barely paying the labor of preparing and transporting it. The want of regular communication with a market has prevented the investment of manufacturing capital in this valley; and as the present condition of the river has made the money already invested in coal lands along its banks unproductive, there is no demand for labor except in the lumber trade.

Professor D. D. Owen, in his report on the geology of the State of Kentucky, states that the best exposure he has seen of the coal measures of the Big Sandy Valley is in the vicinity of Prestonsburgh. In Lawrence County, south of Louisa, on the Big Sandy River, he found six or seven beds of coal measuring in the ascending order from two to four feet in thickness, and above these a bed of cannel coal. In Johnson, Floyd, and Pike Counties he found numerous beds of coal, the main vein consisting of three strata of the united thickness of seven and a half to eight feet. The analysis of the coal of this valley gives from 30 to 35 per cent. of volatile matter and from 64 to 65 per cent. of carbon. The percentage of ashes is very small. The greater the amount of carbon and the smaller the quantity of ashes, the better the coal for manufacturing purposes.

The report of the commissioner of emigration of West Virginia states that beds of hematites, oxides, and peroxides of iron are found in the great coal regions of the Kanawha and Big Sandy Valleys. In many places iron ore alternates with coal and lime.

I am enabled by the kindness of Professor N. S. Shaler, superintendent of the geological survey of the State of Kentucky, to present his personal observations of the geological features of this valley in the following report:

NEWPORT, KENTUCKY, January 1, 1875.

MY DEAR SIR: It gives me great pleasure to answer your questions concerning the mineral resources of the Big Sandy or Chatterawha River. Unfortunately the geological survey has not yet been carried far enough in that valley to enable me to speak in much detail concerning its resources; but enough is determined to warrant me in the general statements contained in the following brief report. These statements are based on my personal observations so far as the valley of the principal stream is concerned; for the Tug Fork branch I have the statements of my esteemed associate, Mr. A. R. Crandall, principal geological assistant of the Kentucky survey.

Very sincerely yours,

N. S. SHALER,
Superintendent of the Kentucky Survey.

J. E. BELL, Civil Engineer.

GEOLOGICAL RESOURCES OF THE BIG SANDY VALLEY.

Mineral resources.

Every part of this valley which has been explored by the Kentucky survey lies in the rocks of the Carboniferous age, or at least above the level of the base of the subcarboniferous limestone. Its mineral stores are therefore limited to the materials found within these geological bounds. Coal, iron, and salt, together with building-stone and fire-clay, are the products that may be sought here. The coal-beds of this valley are doubtless, in part, the western extension of the beds of the Kanawha Valley, and therefore in a measure to be judged by those well-known sources of coal.

I have only to say in conclusion, sir, that we were induced to hurry this bill through the House in the first instance, so that it might reach the Senate and be acted on as soon as possible and then all differences be reconciled, and then it would become a law in time for the letting of contracts and doing much work this fall. But, Mr. Speaker, the bill made haste slowly in the Senate, till now it is altogether too late in the season to attempt to carry out the provisions of the bill this year. In addition to that it is only a job fixed up to suit the majority of those interested in the bill. It is not fair nor just, nor has it received that careful consideration by this House which it should receive.

I submit whether it would not be better and more satisfactory to all to let this bill lie over till next session, when we can give it that attention which a bill of its importance, appropriating $5,000,000 as it does, must necessarily demand.

I hope that such will be the action of the House at this time, if we desire to prove to the country that this democratic House not only preaches but practices reform.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

The plan of making appropriations for rivers and harbors and other public works as adopted by this House is too much like the practical workings of the civil-service reform doctrine as put into operation by the democracy wherever they have the control of official patronage. No one has been able to discover any evidence of reform in the civil service as practiced by this House.

You elected a salary-grabber for your Clerk; and for your Doorkeeper, the author of the celebrated Fitzhugh letter. Both these gentlemen at the outset showed their faith in civil-service reform by turning out competent wounded and crippled Union soldiers in order to give places to incompetent partisan friends and relatives. To show how far they would carry the principles of civil-service reform, the Doorkeeper appointed his son to an eighteen-hundred-dollar position and the Clerk appointed his uncle to a thirty-six-hundred-dollar clerkship. Now this is partisan deformity, not practical reform. I would like for some gentleman to name a single appointment under this House that has been made on account of the excellent qualifications and high moral character of the appointee. Do you call it reform to turn sixty-seven competent Union soldiers out of office for no other cause than that you wish to give their places to so many partisan friends? I am decidedly in favor of internal improvements, and I believe in practical economy and reform, especially reform in the civil service. Let us see if you do.

I take the following from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for April 1, 1876:

CHIEF CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At the request of the Speaker, the Chair lays before the House a communication which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 31, 1876.

SIR: I notice in the RECORD of day before yesterday, the 29th instant, the following remarks purporting to have been made by Hon. J. D. WHITE, of Kentucky, in reference to myself:

"Knowing as I did of a charge of corruption made against Hon. Green Adams, now Chief Clerk of this House, while he was Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, for appropriating several thousands of dollars to his own use which should have been paid into the Treasury, since the money was the proceeds of the sales of waste paper which belonged to the Government—I say that, being cognizant of these facts, it struck me as a little bit amusing that this man Green Adams should be the officer of this pure democratic House to carry articles of impeachment from here over to the Senate. He was a republican then, but you took him from us and reward him with a high office."

The facts in regard to the matter thus alluded to are as follows:

In the year 1864 I resigned the office of Sixth Auditor of the Treasury for the purpose of accepting the office of Treasury agent for the purchase of products of insurrectionary States, at Nashville, Tennessee, and hurriedly left for the performance of the duties of the new office to which I had been appointed, without making or pretending to make any final settlement of my accounts with my successor, who had not then been appointed, and who I had good reason to believe would not be appointed for some time thereafter; leaving, however, on file in the Auditor's Office, over my own signature, receipts for all moneys received by me on account of waste-paper or otherwise.

After the lapse of some time an Auditor was appointed, who found on file my receipts and reported to the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Fessenden, that there was a balance due from me to the Office, and thereupon, my attention being called to the fact, the amount found due from me to the Office was promptly paid over to my successor and his receipt taken therefor.

From that time to this I am not aware that any one has ever seriously charged me with anything improper in connection with this matter; and, whatever may be the suspicions of others, it is certain that Mr. Fessenden, who was then Secretary of the Treasury and was cognizant of all the facts, never charged or even suspected me of any impropriety or attempted impropriety in this connection, but, on the contrary, manifested his entire confidence in my integrity and uprightness of character by retaining me in the responsible office of purchasing agent and placing to my credit large sums of money to be used by me for the Government.

I have thought proper to state this much in explanation of the matter thus alluded to, and respectfully request in justice to myself that this communication be laid before the House of Representatives.

I am not conscious of ever having appropriated to my own use any money belonging to the Government, and will esteem it a favor to have thoroughly investigated any charge of this kind which any one may see proper to make against me.

Very respectfully,

GREEN ADAMS.

Hon. M. C. KERR,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. BOONE. I move that the communication just read be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, with instructions to investigate and report whether or not the charges made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] are true or false.

Mr. WHITE. I second that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The New York Times of August 1 speaks of Hon. Green Adams as follows:

The successor of Clinton Lloyd as Chief Clerk in the office of the Clerk of the House is Green Adams, the uncle of the Clerk, Adams—a case of nepotism reversed. Green Adams was formerly Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department. While in that position the chief clerk, Sharretts, sold waste paper to the value of $5,392.76, and paid to Green Adams out of the amount, $2,517.52. Neither Sharretts nor Adams ever accounted for the money till both were out of office. When the facts were partially discovered through the man who bought the paper, Sharretts refunded $2,345.24, and turned over Green Adams's receipts for the remainder to the amount stated above. Adams makes a long statement, which is in effect that he was informed by Sharretts that this money had been kept by the Auditors because there was no fund into which it could be received in the Treasury Department, and Sharretts said, "If you pay it to any person, pay it to your successor in office." But Sharretts had never heard of this money being paid over except by one Auditor. Adams had intended to pay the money over to his successor, but went home before his successor was appointed. These facts appear in the public records, and show that the present Chief Clerk is either not a very honest man or not a very competent officer. Adams is also an ex-member of the House.

The Interior Journal, a democratic paper published at Stanford, Kentucky, referred to his appointment in the following sarcastic manner:

Mr. George M. Adams has appointed his uncle, Green Adams, of Lexington, his Chief Clerk. Kinsfolk ought to stand back. This act of Mr. Adams looks very much like Grantism.

The ex-circuit-court judge, Ex-Congressman, and Ex-Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, and the present Chief Clerk of this House, Hon. Green Adams, is so well known in Kentucky that the following copies of official records on file in the Treasury Department will not surprise his acquaintances there so much as the majority of this House, who are responsible for his appointment. I shall incorporate them as a part of my remarks.

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY
FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
December 7, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following statement of the facts in regard to the misappropriation of funds belonging to the Post-Office Department by John F. Sharretts, while acting as chief clerk of this Bureau.

Early in December, 1864, George I. Hill, jr., was introduced to me by Mr. Zevely, Third Assistant Postmaster-General, who stated that Mr. Hill had been purchasing the waste paper from the Department for several years, was a reliable man, and desired to purchase the accumulated quarterly returns of postmasters for waste paper.

By the act of May 24, 1858, the Postmaster-General is authorized to dispose of such accumulated returns after they had been preserved two years, paying for the labor of separating them from the accounts-current and putting them in bags. By an order of the Postmaster-General dated May 27, 1858, a copy of which is hereto appended, this business was delegated to the Auditor. Mr. Hill stated that he had been in the habit of buying this waste paper from Mr. Sharretts, giving the highest market price therefor.

Inquiry being made as to where the money received from this source should be paid, it was ascertained that Mr. Sharretts has never paid over any such money to any officer either of the Treasury or Post-Office Department. On an interview with Mr. Sharretts he admitted that he had never so paid it over, but would do so as soon as he could notify Judge Adams to be ready to pay over the amount in his hands and when it was decided where the money should be deposited. It does not appear that he ever made any inquiries on the subject or ever made any endeavor to ascertain the proper fund to which to appropriate the money. He left no record whatever of the transactions, and although he served under me as chief clerk for several days after I first entered upon the duties of this office, he gave me no intimation, either written or verbal, that he had made such sales or received such money. He left his successor, Mr. McGrew, my present chief clerk, in equal ignorance of any sales of paper. He does not pretend that he had any right to it himself. All the waste paper of the above description sold by Mr. Sharretts was bought by two persons, Mr. Hill, above mentioned, and Mr. Denham. The receipts for the money paid were given by Mr. Sharretts. Some are signed "John F. Sharretts, chief clerk," and some merely "John F. Sharretts." The dates of delivery and amounts of property sold and of money received are as follows:

Date.	Pounds.	Price per pound.	Amount.
		Cents.
September 11, 1861	8,271	2½	$175 76
September 18, 1861	9,179	2½	195 05
April 11, 1862	19,128	2½	406 47
August 28, 1862	20,572	2⅛	437 15
December 23, 1862	11,840	5⅛	606 00
May 21, 1863	10,821	5	540 05
August 12, 1863	11,325	4	453 00
November 11, 1863	10,824	6	649 44
March 9, 1864	10,191	6¾	687 88
May 31, 1864	9,661	6½	626 96
August 26, 1864	9,250	6	550 00
Total			5,392 76

Out of this amount the sum of $530 was paid by Sharretts to Richard White, laborer, for his labor in separating the accounts-current from the quarterly returns and bagging the latter. Mr. White alleges that whereas before Mr. Sharretts became chief clerk he received $40 per month for this service he only received from Mr. Sharretts $530 for his labor during three years; the latter alleging that in the present disordered state of the national finances he was anxious to save as much as possible to the Government, and that the Secretary of the Treasury had complained to him (Sharretts) that he was paying too much for the stripping and other work done in preparing the paper for sale.

Since the passage of the law authorizing the sale of transcripts the proceeds have never been deposited in the Treasury by any person whatever.

The law of May 24, 1858, makes it the duty of the Postmaster-General to sell the property here referred to. The law of July 2, 1836, section 1, provides that the "revenues arising in the Post-Office Department and all debts due to the same shall when collected be paid under the direction of the Postmaster-General into the Treasury of the United States"

On the 7th of December, Mr. Sharrets called at my office and stated that being out of office he desired to pay over to the Government some funds remaining in his hands. He then paid me the sum of $2,345.24, which I have deposited in the Treasury. He also gave me receipts of Green Adams for various sums, amounting in all to $2,517.52, which he said was the amount appropriated by Adams out of the proceeds of the sale of waste paper.

The receipts are now in my possession.

Section 4 of the act of August 31, 1852, (10 Statutes at Large, 140,) is as follows. I underscore the words specially applicable to this case:

"And be it further enacted, That if any person shall steal, purloin, or embezzle any mail-bags in use by or belonging to the Post-Office Department of the United States, or any other property in use by or belonging to the said Post-Office Department, or shall for any lucre, gain, or convenience appropriate any such property to his own use or any other than its proper use, or for any lucre or gain shall convey away any such property to the hinderance or detriment of the public service of the United States, the person so offending, his counselors, aiders, and abettors, (knowing of and privy to any offense aforesaid,) shall on conviction thereof, if the value of such property shall exceed $25, be deemed guilty of felony, and shall be imprisoned for a period not exceeding three years; or, if the value of such property shall be less than $25, shall be imprisoned not more than one year, or be fined not less than $10 nor more than $200 for every such offense."

It seems strange that when the duty of public officers is so obvious and so clearly defined by the law, none of those who have heretofore had charge of the sale of waste paper should have been able to perceive it. Until recently waste paper has had but little value, and perhaps the sales barely paid for the labor. It is understood in the office that Mr. Tate, the predecessor of Mr. Adams, stated that he had in his hands some $800 belonging to the office, and that he would make a settlement on receiving the last payment of his salary. He went away, intending to return, but was prevented by the military operations in Virginia.

The money arising from the sale of waste paper is clearly a revenue of the Post-Office Department. The law having appropriated such moneys, it could make no difference what clerk or what Bureau had charge of the task of collecting them. They must be paid as designated by the act. There is no authority conferred either upon the Auditor, the chief clerk, or the messenger to appropriate the money to his own use, and thus create a claim in favor of the United States against a person who is not by law intrusted with the keeping of moneys, who gives no bonds for the safe-keeping of any property, and who may be pecuniarily irresponsible.

If section 16 of the act of August 6, 1846, (9 Statutes at Large, 63,) "to provide for the better organization of the Treasury and for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," is applicable to this case, which is doubtful, the money misappropriated can be recovered in the form of a penalty. Should the parties be indicted under the act of 1852, above quoted, a civil suit would be necessary in order to recover the money should they refuse to refund.

I have had no communication with Mr. Adams on the subject and have received nothing from him.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

——— ———, Auditor.

Hon. WM. P. FESSENDEN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, May 27, 1868.

SIR: Whereas by the provisions of the eighth section of the act approved 2d July, 1836, (U. S. L., 5th, page 81,) all accounts arising in the Post-Office Department, or relative thereto, are to be received by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, to be audited and settled, and to be kept and preserved by him after settlement, I have to request that, pursuant to the provisions of the act, No. 31, approved May 24, 1858, copied on preceding page, you proceed to dispose of the quarterly returns of mails sent and received, and use such portions of the proceeds thereof as may be necessary to defray the cost of separating and disposing of the same and re-arranging and filing the accounts-current and vouchers.

AARON V. BROWN,
Postmaster-General

THOMAS M. TATE,
Auditor for the Post-Office Department.

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY
FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
December 9, 1864.

SIR: In my report of the 7th instant, on the misappropriation of certain funds heretofore derived from the sale of waste paper by John F. Sharretts and Green Adams, I stated that no money derived from such sales had ever been paid into the Treasury of the United States by any person whatever. I have the honor to submit the following statement of the amount, so far as it can be ascertained, of such sales since the passage of the law of May 24, 1858, by which act they were authorized. This amount is obtained from receipts which were given to George J. Hill, who had bought all the waste paper of the Department.

In three cases the amounts are estimated:

Date.	Receipts signed by—	Amount.
July 2, 1858	H. St. Geo. Offutt	$317 94
December 14, 1858	..... do	476 00
February 22, 1859	..... do	317 94
April 2, 1859	..... do	294 05
June 11, 1859	..... do	229 67
September 9, 1859	..... do	254 25
January 31, 1860	..... do	233 29
April, 1860	No receipt. Estimated	294 00
June 26, 1860	H. St. Geo. Offutt	315 24
September, 1860	No receipt. Estimated	300 00
April 6, 1861	Paid Auditor Tate	74 14
Estimated deficit from September 1, 1860, to June, 1861		750 00
Total		3,916 52
Paid Richard White, laborer, during the above term for labor in preparing the paper for sale		1,360 00
Net profit to the Department		2,556 52

Prior to 1858 there is no record of any sales whatever.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

E. SELLS, Auditor.

Hon. WM. P. FESSENDEN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WASHINGTON CITY, December 15, 1864.

SIR: I have carefully examined the report of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, under date of the 7th instant, in relation to moneys arising from the sale of waste paper in said Office during my administration thereof, which report you did me the favor to hand to me on yesterday.

Respecting the acts of Congress cited in said report, and the conclusions drawn therefrom, I do not deem it necessary to say anything. Nor have I anything to say with regard to the statement of facts contained in said report, except so far as relates to my own conduct touching the moneys aforesaid. Involving, as said report does, my character both as a public officer and an honest man, I gladly embrace the opportunity you have kindly afforded me to submit the following brief statement of the facts of the case, so far as I am connected with the transaction in question.

When I entered upon the duties of the office of Auditor for the Post-Office Department in April, 1861, I was not aware that the Office was charged with the business of selling waste paper, and remained in ignorance of that fact until in September of that year, when John F. Sharretts, the chief clerk, handed me a sum of money, stating that it was the proceeds of the sale of certain waste paper, and asked me to sign a receipt therefor. I asked him why I should take the money, and what disposition I should make of the same. He replied, that I being the head of the Bureau, was the proper person to have the custody of the money. I asked him, why not deposit it in the Treasury at once? He responded, that he had been to the Treasury and had inquired what should be done with the money, whether there was any head under or any fund to the credit of which it could be placed in the Treasury, and that he had been informed there was no such head or fund.

He also stated that it had been the uniform custom of the Auditors to retain the funds, and that my immediate predecessor, Dr. Tate, it was reported, had some seven or eight hundred dollars of the fund in his hands.

I then received and receipted for the money, stating at the same time that whatever might have been the custom, I could not appropriate to my own use any funds in the Office except my salary. Subsequently, the chief clerk paid over to me from time to time, and took vouchers for the several sums, I suppose, contained in my receipts filed with the Auditor; although I was not aware that I had received exceeding $1,500 from him. The chief clerk and myself had repeated conversations as to what disposition I should make of the money; and his uniform advice was that if I paid it to any person it should be to my successor in office, as he had never heard of any portion of the fund having been paid over except by one Auditor, and that he had paid to his successor.

I all the while entertained the belief that I was receiving the whole proceeds of the sales of the waste paper, and was much surprised to learn that the chief clerk had retained any portion thereof, as he represented to me that the several sums paid over constituted the entire fund.

The receipts I gave him I intended should be filed in the Office as vouchers to show the amount in my hands for which I was responsible. I regarded it as proper that my receipts should show that the money had been paid to me by the chief clerk, inasmuch as he had receipted in his own name, as he informed me, to the purchaser of the paper; but I did not suppose that he would withdraw them from the files of the Office, where they properly belonged.

I intended in good faith to pay over to my successor, when appointed, every dollar of the money placed in my hands by the chief clerk. I left, however, for Nashville, Tennessee, before a successor was appointed. And when the chief clerk, Mr. Sharretts, represented to my successor (as appears in that officer's report) that I had appropriated a portion of the fund, he stated what he well knew to be wholly untrue. My oft-repeated declarations to him that I would pay over the money to my successor could not have escaped from his recollection.

Trusting that upon the foregoing statement of the facts of the case you will at least acquit me of any intentional wrong,

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GREEN ADAMS.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FESSENDEN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

It appears from these official statements that Green Adams had received this sum by piece-meal. A portion of the $2,517.52 he received as early as September 11, 1861, and a portion he received as late as August 26, 1864. But the larger portion of the sum which he appropriated was received during the years 1862 and 1863. It also appears that he did not make a fair division with his then chief clerk, John F. Sharretts; for while Adams received $2,517.52, Sharretts got but $2,345.24; and as Adams took advantage of Sharretts, so Sharretts took advantage of Richard White, laborer, who received but $530 "for his labor in separating the accounts-current from the quarterly returns and bagging the latter." Sharretts's excuse to R. White for this small allowance for his services was that on account of the present "disordered state of the national finances" he could not pay much "for the strippings."

And Green Adams with this waste-paper record, to say nothing of his notoriety as a political trickster and corruptionist, is a specimen of your civil-service reform. If he kept this money with a view to defrauding the Government, then he was a thief. If he kept it through ignorance, then he was not capable of understanding the law. In either case he is not such an appointee as to reflect honor on this House.

On the 24th of March, 1876, in a five-minutes speech, I used the following language concerning the Chief Clerk:

Mr. Chairman, I also am in favor of retrenchment and reform; but it is not for gentlemen on the other side of the House to preach reform to us on this side of the House. I have never said anything in regard to that Belknap affair, but it has always occurred to me since that matter came before the House that it was very appropriate that the Chief Clerk of this House, Hon. Green Adams, against whom the suspicion of having pocketed some of the people's money exists, should carry the articles of impeachment over to the other wing of this Capitol against a man charged with stealing nothing from the United States Government, but from private individuals.

When I made those remarks I knew that the papers which have just been read were on file in the Treasury Department, and I think that they warranted the statement that I made against the integrity and honesty of the Chief Clerk of this House.

It may well be asked what claim has he for his position except that he is uncle to Hon. G. M. Adams, Clerk of the House, and that his father-in-law is a surety on the Clerk's bond.

ANOTHER REFORMER.

C. H. Smith, the late journal clerk, was caught in "a grave error of judgment, which tends to create a conflict in his mind between duty and interest." He resigned in disgrace.

ELLISON, THE ENGINEER OF THE HOUSE.

George C. Ellison, the engineer of the House, was appointed under such peculiar circumstances that it is sheer nonsense to talk of civil-service reform in connection with the farcical competitive examination in which he was the lucky candidate. Facts are the strongest arguments. Count up the large number of absentees which were caused by the bad ventilation of this Hall during the last winter and spring. The ill-health of too many of our members and the well-known fact that the ventilation was miserably bad showed that Ellison was incompetent at the time of his appointment.

A further proof of his incompetency is to be found in the fact that the author of the following letter to Colonel Alexander, editor of the Washington Gazette, was soon after its publication appointed assistant engineer:

67 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK, March 21, 1876.

DEAR COLONEL: I herewith send you a slip from yesterday's times. I seen the proceedings in the sun of last week the same as you sent me, and I sent a letter to Judge HOLMAN telling him the falt was in the Engineer, and I see the committee have my exact words; and I sent him another letter yesterday which I think will have some effect, and I send you the original printed by Doctor Thiers,* who states that Ellison knows he printed it, and he don't care who knows it, as he will tell anybody he is. I went and seen some of the witnesses. Mr. Delano says he was discharged for stealing pipes and other Government stores, but his record is in the Navy Department. He lives at 115 St. Marks ave., Brooklyn, and is well known in the Navy-yard. He is on the retired list. Mr. Cosgrove, the Master Plumber of the yard in the Department of Construction, was Ellison's Quarterman, and he says so. He is Master Plumber there now. Mr. Jas. Hunter, who is Plumber in yards and Docks, knows all the circumstances of what is in this statement. It was from him I got my information, and if any of them was put on the witness stand they would tell a great deal more than they tell me; in fact, everybody who was in the yard at the time knows of it; it was no secret. As regards to the other matters in the statement, I don't think amounts to much, as some of the parties are dead; but the Dr. says he can prove the most of it. I see him almost daily. He is the man that was poisoned by Ellison, and has the bottle yet. He is well known in Washington by W. W. Woods (Chief Engineer Navy Department,) Mr. English, who use to be round your office, and Mr. Geer, and others. I want you to take good care of this, so it can be returned to me. The Sunday Mercury was burned out and lost its files, and I hunted all over to try and find one but failed. Mr. Collwell, the owner, has promised to see if he can't find it for me. If he does I will send it to you. I think you could get his record in the Na'y Department, as you have the dates. I think if you will see Major Cburn, the Herald, and tell him it's for me he can get you an order from some of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Senate, as I dont't want to touch the the House. I don't want to be known in this matter of Ellison's removal. Now you can act with Mr. Lockwood in this matter, as I think it will take very little to finish Ellison, and let me know how you make out in this; and if you can get my letters before the committee I think they will recommend me. Write and let me know how things are and who is assistant as soon as possible.

Yours, &c.,

JAMES McGLENSEY.

The following resolution, introduced April 1, 1876, by a democratic member from Illinois, is a fair sample of the indignant expressions which were made against the engineer when the ventilation was so intolerable as to threaten to leave the House without a quorum:

VENTILATION OF THE HALL

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to discharge the present engineer and appoint some competent person in his place."

Mr. Speaker, I desire to have this resolution referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for the purpose of having an early report upon this subject. I do not know this engineer, nor do I know anything as to the truth of the statement which I find in the papers, that he is endeavoring to demonstrate the insufficiency of our heating and ventilating apparatus, in order to have the House adopt some other system of heating and ventilation. I know nothing about these things; but I do say that if he had desired to introduce a system of torture, he could hardly have accomplished the result more successfully than he has done for the last few weeks. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

COLONEL L. H. FITZHUGH, LATE DOORKEEPER

to the House of Representatives of the United States, and late sergeant-at-arms to the senate of the so-called Confederate States, was discharged in disgrace for writing a silly and foolish letter to a friend who made it public because Fitzhugh would not appoint a certain McClancy to a position under him. Fitzhugh was charged with grave offenses, such as larceny, perjury, arson, &c., but my colleague, Judge DURHAM, put an end to an investigation of these charges by a letter to Fitzhugh and a statement to the Committee on Rules.

The letter is now on file in the Speaker's room, and reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 19, 1875.

DEAR SIR: In regard to your troubles at Crab Orchard, I have this to say: My opinion is there was not the least foundation in fact upon which you should have been indicted in either case.

Having been your counsel in both cases, I believe both were gotten up through malice or under a misapprehension of the facts. You were promptly acquitted in both cases.

I don't think there was scarcely any person who believed you to be guilty.

Yours,

M. J. DURHAM.

Mr. L. H. FITZHUGH.

The committee in referring to Fitzhugh's letter to a friend living at Sherman, Texas, in which he asserted—

I am a biger man with the members than old Grant.

* * * * * * *

I am making up a party already to come on to Texas on the adjournment, S. S. COX to head it. he is the warmest friend of mine you ever saw.

* * * * * * *

I have now fifty letters from my southern friends from all parts of the South congratulating me. thus wags the world. let a man be prosperous and every man is his friend—

report as follows:

Even those who find nothing bad in the character of the man who wrote this letter, and who acquit its writer of any misconduct in office, agree that the letter is supremely weak and foolish. It evidences an unbalanced and unreliable judgment. Making every allowance for the privacy of the letter, it betrays ignorance of his relations to the House and its members. The appointment of his son, a mere boy, to a twenty-one-hundred-dollar place, and when that was vacated by him then his re-appointment and retention as file clerk at a salary of $1,800, shows a disregard of a principle of civil service frequently commented upon of late, and which demands unselfishness, fitness, maturity, and capacity. The letter betrays a giddiness which betokens a character unsuited to the serious and responsible position which a Doorkeeper should possess. His retention of the position would bring the House into ridicule and contempt among that class of "plain people" who are the best critics of the decorum and decency which should attach to the one of the two first law-making bodies in our land. Setting aside all charges as to the personal character of the officer, there is enough in the letter, which it is needless and painful to analyze further, to show that he is unfit for the position. Whether it be a public or private letter, it is indicative of the spirit of the officer as regards the honor of members of the House and the respect due from him to other high officers of the Government.

But as to the criminal charges against Fitzhugh the committee had only this to say, namely:

2. As to the indictments for arson, larceny, and perjury, the committee heard the statement of Judge DURHAM, of Kentucky, who had been the attorney of Colonel Fitzhugh in these several cases; and if the records were not sufficient to estop the committee from inquiry into the charges, the statement of Judge DURHAM is conclusive, namely, that if he had been on the jury he would have been bound to acquit upon the testimony.

Now it occurred to me at the time the committee made that report that it had either made a mistake or that Judge DURHAM overshot the mark when he rose to a question of privilege in this House and said:

DOORKEEPER OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask the Clerk to read the passage marked in the paper which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Judge M. J. DURHAM, the present Representative in Congress from this district, is perfectly cognizant of the truth of this accusation. If put upon the witness-stand, he would be compelled, reluctantly of course, to convict Fitzhugh of perjury. I have been amazed for several months that he has countenanced or acquiesced in the imposition of such a creature upon his House, upon the party, and upon the country. This amazement is not confined to myself. In the opinion of many other friends of the judge it is now entirely in order that he should rise in his seat and explain.

W. G. WELCH.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, the sentence just read is the close of a long article I find in the Louisville Daily Courier-Journal of May 5, and copied in the National Republican of yesterday. The preceding part of the article speaks of the indictments against Colonel Fitzhugh, the present Doorkeeper of this House, his trial and acquittal; that the negro Tom Scott had sued in the Federal court certain parties who he alleged had maltreated him; that Colonel Fitzhugh was sworn as a witness on the trial of the case; that he had sworn falsely in twelve particulars, &c.

Now, I am cognizant of the facts spoken of by Mr. Welch thus far, to wit, that Colonel Fitzhugh was indicted for three offenses spoken of by him; he was tried and acquitted of each and all of them, as stated by him. I was one of his counsel in the cases. Tom Scott, the negro spoken of by Mr. Welch, sued the parties named by him in the Federal court, and recovered judgment against all of them except Dr. Dunlap. Colonel Fitzhugh was sworn as a witness for said Scott. I was summoned and sworn as a witness also in the case. We were both examined as to some matters occurring during the investigation of the charges against Colonel Fitzhugh. In some of these we differed. To what exten tand what were the points of difference I cannot now remember, but they were regarded as material in the trial of the case. I then remembered them with distinctness, and thought Colonel Fitzhugh's statements were incorrect where we differed.

I should state further that in consequence of sickness in my family I did not reach Washington until Monday morning, the day the House was organized, the democratic caucus at which Colonel Fitzhugh was nominated for Doorkeeper having been held on the Saturday evening previous, and I did not know that he was a candidate for the position until after he was nominated. Had I been in the city before the caucus was held, and had known his name would have been presented, I should have communicated these facts to those who were pressing his claims, that they might have judged as to the propriety or impropriety of his nomination.

I will state further that I had no personal acquaintance with Colonel Fitzhugh until I was employed to defend him in said charges; but, as is stated by Mr. Welch, he was generally popular in the community where he lived.

Messrs. Welch, Dunlap, Jones, Shannon, and all the parties sued by Tom Scott were gentlemen of good standing and high respectability, and that community, knowing them and Colonel Fitzhugh and knowing what occurred at all these trials, have made up their judgment as to the real guilt or innocence of the parties implicated.

I make these statements not for those who know the facts where they occurred, but that the members of this House and others may see how much I know of the matters stated in the article just read and how far I have been connected with them. I have heretofore explained these matters frequently to members who have asked me in regard thereto.

CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

Hon. G. M. Adams, a captain in the Federal Army till Lincoln issued his emancipation proclamation, afterward appointed additional paymaster in the Federal Army, with the rank of major; a politician until he "got poor in politics," and a salary-grabber before he got to be Clerk, is another specimen of civil-service reform as practiced by the Simon-pure democracy that controls this House. The House was quite as unfortunate in the selection of its Clerk as that officer was in appointing his uncle, Green, to be Chief Clerk.

The following comment is taken from the Cynthiana News, a democratic paper:

Matt. Adams, the man who is elected Clerk of the House of Congress, voted for the bill known as the salary-grab, took the money, came home, and prepared a speech, it was said, to justify his acts; but the democracy of Kentucky, through their representatives in the Legislature, condemned him and all other salary-grabbers as wanting in patriotism and unworthy the confidence of the people. The members from Kentucky who voted for and took the grab were set aside as unworthy to represent the people again, and the present delegation put in their places should have taken some pains not to support a man to a respectable position as Clerk of the House of Representatives who rested under condemnation, especially, too, for an act that was considered scandalous to the nation and looked upon as such by all parties. Furthermore, if the delegation were determined that none other than a Yankee soldier could fill the place, why not get one who had a respectable political record at least, which it seems Mr. Adams has not? Take the action of the democratic caucus all in all the good common sense of the people has been terribly outraged, and we can see it in no other light. No such stultification will be permitted by the people. The people cannot be forced to eat dirt. We see another political grave-yard in the future, and certain people are traveling there rapidly.

A democratic paper can thus comment on the war record of a Federal officer who afterward became a salary-grabber and Clerk of a democratic House of Representatives, but when I referred to the fact I was taken severely to task by two of my colleagues.

Of the propriety of their remarks the country will, I think, agree with the sentiment expressed in the following extract from the Mountain Echo, published at London, Kentucky:

LITTLE MATT.

Hon. Matt Adams's war record and salary-grab record were attacked in Congress the other day. His war record was defended by two rebel democrats, and his salary-grab by a salary-grabber.

If Major Matt. Adams desires to maintain an untarnished reputation as a Federal soldier he should quit bedding with PROCTOR KNOTT and JOE. BLACKBURN. Whatever may be claimed for those gentlemen in other respects, they are not good company for a Union soldier.

The following dispatch to the Baltimore Gazette, a democratic newspaper, was enlarged upon in an editorial in the Washington

Gazette, which latter was made by order of the House April 26, 1876, the basis for an investigation into the conduct of the Clerk and his subordinates in relation to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill:

TREASON IN THE CAMP—EMPLOYÉS OF THE HOUSE CONSPIRING AGAINST A REDUCTION OF SALARIES.

[Special dispatch to the Baltimore Gazette.]

WASHINGTON, March 20.

There will not only be a determined but an organized opposition to the executive, legislative, and judicial appropriation bill. It appears that the House employés, headed by the Clerk, have combined to influence their friends on the democratic side to unite with the republicans in voting to recommit the bill to the Appropriation Committee with instructions that if a systematic reduction of salaries is to be made it should be on the basis of salaries at the time they were fixed. That would require the committee to reduce the pay of Senators and members to $2,700, as their pay was $3,000 per annum when the existing rates of compensation were allowed to Department clerks and most of the House employés. The leadership of the opposition to the bill will be on the republican side. On the other hand, Mr. RANDALL, chairman of the committee, will, when the time comes, speak plainly of this insubordination in the party and on the part of employés, and will intimate that those who do not find the compensation proposed large enough to meet their wants can readily seek employment elsewhere. But for them to oppose the work of a leading committee and one of the radical duties demanded by the country is more than the leader of the House proposes to endure in silence. The plotters against the just intentions of the Appropriation Committee will be called conspirators and their combination denounced as traitorous.

The Committee on Rules had disposed of C. H. Smith, late journal clerk, and L. H. Fitzhugh, late Doorkeeper, so readily, that that committee was ordered to investigate the Clerk, Hon. G. M. Adams. For nearly a month nothing was done with the resolution. In the mean time, the Chicago Inter Ocean charged that the Clerk was farming out his appointments. The Clerk asked for an investigation, and a select committee was appointed for that purpose. It was suddenly discovered that the resolution which I had introduced should also be referred to that select committee. It was suddenly discovered that one officer of the House should not be investigated by another officer of the House, and especially the Clerk should not be investigated by a committee that had for its chairman the Speaker pro tempore and among its members two Ex-Speakers of the House, notwithstanding the fact that this identical Committee on Rules had investigated Doorkeeper Fitzhugh and discharged him in disgrace; and likewise had investigated C. H. Smith and compelled him to resign; and so the resolution to investigate the Clerk was reported back to the House by the Committee on Rules and referred, May 20, to the special committee appointed to investigate other charges against the Clerk.

There the matter rested for more than a month. On the 13th of July last that special committee, to whom was intrusted the investigation of the Clerk, Hon. George M. Adams, made the following report, namely:

The special committee to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. WHITE, and adopted by the House on the 26th of April last, directing an inquiry into certain alleged improper attempts of the Clerk of the House and his subordinates to influence legislation, beg leave to report:

That on investigating the facts they find no foundation whatever for the charges contained in the newspaper article recited in the preamble of the resolution; and executing the specific instructions of the House they find from the testimony taken by the committee—

First. That neither the Clerk nor his subordinates have "violated any law or done any act inconsistent with their position as employés of the House;" and Secondly. That "further legislation" is not necessary to protect the House from undue influence on the part of its officers and employés.

The committee recommend that the resolution be laid on the table and the committee discharged.

The report was adopted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to cast any reflection on the action of that committee, but I think that it is entirely proper for the House and the country to have the testimony in this case. I think the Clerk, according to his own testimony, has interfered with the legislation of this House to an extent that is not consistent with his position as a subordinate of this House. I give his language. I quote from his testimony given before his own committee, and it is interesting to any one who desires to know just what this House means by civil-service reform, and, further, what internal improvements here are necessary.

[Extract from testimony of George M. Adams, Clerk of the House of Representatives, June 30, 1876.]

In reference to the reduction of the force, I thought that my experience in the general management of the office for several months, as well as the information I had derived from my predecessor, Mr. McPherson, enabled me to form a better idea of what reductions could be made than any member of the House, who had never given the subject special attention, could have. I was exceedingly anxious to get up facts and figures which would convince the Committee on Appropriations that I was correct in the view I took of the matter, and I know that I did succeed in convincing some of them. Indeed, some of the members were convinced before I said anything to them on the subject. I made out a comparative statement of the force which was required in the Clerk's office at former periods when the Congress was much smaller than it is now, and when as a matter of course there was much less work to be done and much less force required than is required now. That statement I also exhibited to members of the Committee on Appropriations, and it was used by Mr. FOSTER, and if this committee desire to hear it I will read it. [The statement was read from the RECORD of March 22, 1876.]

By Mr. HENDERSON:

Question. Did you make out that statement at your own suggestion or at that of Mr. FOSTER?

Answer. I made out that statement at my own suggestion.

* * * * * * *

Q. State to what extent you recommended or favored reduction.

A. The Chief Clerk, upon whom devolves the duties of the Clerk in case of absence or sickness, and who under existing law was getting $3,600, was proposed to be reduced to $2,250, a reduction of 37 per cent.

The journal clerk, who must be a highly competent man, and who was getting $3,600, was proposed to be reduced to $2,250, and was deprived of the assistant journal clerk, who has heretofore received $3,000, the proposition being that the journal clerk should perform both his own duty and those of the assistant, which had heretofore cost $6,600, for $2,250.

Then the committee proposed to reduce the stationery clerk from $2,160 to $1,500, while the pay of the superintendent of the Clerk's document-room was not to be reduced at all.

When I first went before the Appropriation Committee I took my pen and struck out the names of the employés that I could dispense with.

I proposed to dispense with the chief messenger, at $2,100; the assistant, at $3,000; the assistant enrolling clerk, at $2,160.

I also proposed to dispense with the clock-winder, who had heretofore received $300. I thought the upholsterer could do the work as well.

I proposed to dispense with two folders, at $1,440 each.

Altogether there were about nine that I thought I could dispense with.

Q. Did you recommend the reduction of the salaries of any of them?

A. No, sir. I left the question of the reduction of salaries to the committee. They informed me that they wanted to make reductions, and wished me to tell them where the reductions could be best made.

* * * * * * *

I was asked to come before the full committee, which I did, and gave them my views in extenso in regard to the reductions that could be and ought to be made.

Q. And the full committee, as you understand, reduced the force beyond the recommendation of the subcommittee?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you know of the amendment offered by Mr. WADDELL?

A. I did, and was instrumental in having the amendment offered.

* * * * * * *

Q. That amendment was offered in accordance with your recommendation?

A. Yes, sir; I state unequivocally that that amendment was offered at my suggestion. I have no concealment to make. * * * It reduced the expenses of the office, according to my recollection, about $23,000. The committee proposed to reduce it nearly twice that much, about $45,000.

Q. Did I understand you to say that Mr. WADDELL told you he was opposed to any reductions, and requested you to prepare that amendment?

A. He told me to let him know just what I needed in the office. He said "You know I have always been opposed to any reduction. I am opposed to any reduction in my own pay or in the pay of the officers."

* * * * * * *

That amendment was offered, and I confess that I was anxious to see it adopted. And I have no hesitation in saying that I believe if there had been a vote upon it it would have passed.

* * * * * * *

When this amendment was offered in the House the Committee on Appropriations objected to it, and the night before the amendment was withdrawn I had a conference with the chairman of the committee and told him what I thought would be the result.

* * * * * * *

I ascertained from him what his views were and endeavored to get him to assent, but he declined and spoke of the effect it might have upon the general features of the bill.

* * * * * * *

By Mr. WHITE:

Q. In connection with the statement you have just made, if the committee failed to adopt what you recommended, did you think it was your province or your duty to ask the House to do it?

A. Unquestionably I did, sir.

* * * * * * *

Q. What members besides members of the committee did you go to?

A. I do not remember now. There was quite a number and I don't pretend to remember who they were.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did you understand that the Secretary of the Senate was not going to sustain as great a loss in force as you were; and did you ask him if he was going to prevent the reduction?

A. Yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Q. Are you not aware that some members of the Committee on Appropriations objected to the course you were pursuing?

A. One or two members of the committee spoke of it after some articles had appeared in the newspapers saying that there was a combination to defeat the bill.

* * * * * * *

Q. State what members protested on that subject.

A. Mr. HOLMAN remarked one day, "I understand you have made a combination against us." That was after the matter had been mentioned in some paper, and I assured him that there was nothing of the kind; that I should like to see the bill amended; but as to there being any combination or conspiracy, nothing of the kind existed.

I must confess that I am at a loss to understand how the committee after hearing this testimony of the Clerk's ever came to the conclusions they did. I verily believe that had the same Committee on Rules that so readily disposed of Claim-Agent Smith and Confederate Sergeant-at-Arms Fitzhugh been allowed to make an investigation of the lobbying conduct of the Clerk, they would have reported as they did in the case of C. H. Smith, to wit, that his conduct "involves a grave error of judgment which tends to create a conflict in his mind between duty and interest." And it is the appointment to office of such men as Hon. G. M. Adams and his crew that you call civil-service reform. Green Adams, a thief, or else stupid beyond recovery; C. H. Smith unable to distinguish "between duty and interest;" his master, G. M. Adams, the salary-grabber, no better. The manner of Ellison's appointment not altogether clear. The black-mailer, James McGlensey, appointed to the position of assistant engineer to save the removal of Ellison on account of incompetency. Inexperienced partisans have been appointed to take the place of competent and worthy officials. All this is called civil-service reform. Turning out wounded Union soldiers to make room for incompetent political favorites is reform with a vengeance.

It is a kind of reform that will be properly and thoroughly rebuked at the coming November election.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I have only to say that if this is the kind of reform by which the democratic party expects to recommend itself to the American people, I feel sure that the result of the coming presidential election will prove a sufficient rebuke to such insincerity and dishonesty.

This House can bear witness to the fact that I have taken an active part in securing the removal of its unworthy and incompetent officers. I believe in reform. I believe in rebuking immorality, incompetency, and dishonesty; but I do not believe in that kind of civil-service reform practiced by this House, which is shown by the removal of faithful and competent veteran officers and crippled Union soldiers in order to give salaried positions to incompetent and inexperienced partisan friends who have nothing to recommend them except that they either served in the rebellion or sympathized with it, or never did any harm to the South during the rebellion, or have expressed deep sorrow for the part they took to preserve the Union.

This is not the kind of reform that the people want. They want a reform that will insure an honest collection of the revenues of the Government, and that with the least possible expense. They are satisfied of the fact that there are a great many bad men—corrupt men—in public life. There is no necessity for occupying time on this score. They desire an honest payment of all debts, public and private, and a fulfillment of every promise made to the soldiers. Thousands will ask why we have not passed the bill allowing arrearage of pensions on account of death or wounds received or disease contracted in the service of the United States during the late war. Thousands will wonder that the present oppressive tobacco law has not been modified in some manner like that proposed in the following bill introduced by me, so as to give the poor producer a living chance:

A bill to authorize producers to sell twenty-five dollars' worth of tobacco, on the farm where produced, free of tax, and without requiring a license therefor.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That producers are hereby authorized to sell twenty-five dollars' worth of tobacco without paying any tax thereon or any license therefor: Provided, That the same shall be sold on the farm where produced: And provided further, That any producer availing himself of this provision shall keep a memorandum of the amount of each sale and the name of purchaser, for the inspection of any authorized agent of the Government.

Thousands will want to know why some such measure as the following was not adopted to effect the collection of revenue on whisky manufactured in remote localities. They will ask, Is there no way by which the Government can avoid paying more to its officers in salaries than the revenue of whole congressional districts amounts to?

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 5, 1876.

Mr. WHITE, on leave, introduced the following joint resolution:

Joint resolution to economize in the collection of internal revenue on distilled spirits in "remote and out-of-the-way localities."

Whereas "in the mountainous districts of several of the Southern States there is a great deal of illicit distilling of spirits in remote and out-of-the-way localities;" and whereas "the distilling apparatus used is of a simple and inexpensive nature," easily removed and of little value; and whereas the legal distilling of spirits in such "remote and out-of-the-way localities" costs the Government for hire of officers more than the revenue collected amounts to; and whereas the present law, which makes no distinction between hand-mash copper distilleries and steam distilleries, is unjust, and tempts the reckless to make "moonshine" whisky: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to discharge all store-keepers for distilleries having an average daily capacity of less than ten wine-gallons; and that the said Commissioner require the gaugers attendant upon all hand-mash copper distilleries having an average daily capacity of less than ten wine gallons to collect a special tax of not less than $25 nor more than $100, according to the capacity of the distillery, for each six months, or parts thereof, said hand-mash copper distilleries may operate.

And tens of thousands of honest and moral people will ask why some bill has not been passed by this Congress looking to the final disuse of intoxicating liquors.

The prohibitionists, who have met in convention and adopted the following, will be especially disappointed:

Be it resolved by the friends of prohibition and reform in convention assembled, That we regard our form of government the best known to men, and with just, wholesome, and equal laws, honest, qualified, and sober officers, perfect liberty, life, property, and happiness can be enjoyed by every person, and it will become, under an all-wise Providence, an asylum indeed for the oppressed of all nations, who have been and should yet be cordially invited to make this their home and country.

Resolved, That we will from this time forth in political matters adhere to these principles of reform, regarding them (as they are) legitimate subjects of State and national legislation, and will cast our votes for no one who will not pledge to carry them out.

And all that class of practical reformers who would prevent the evil effects of intemperance by prohibiting the manufacture or importation or sale of spirituous liquors will feel aggrieved that Congress paid no attention to their views, embodied in the following bill:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
May 1, 1876.

Mr. WHITE, on leave, introduced the following bill:

A bill to lessen crime and human suffering from alcoholism by restricting the use of distilled spirits to scientific, mechanical, and medicinal purposes.

Whereas the injurious effects from the use, as a beverage, of intoxicating liquors are universally admitted; and whereas spirituous liquors are powerful instruments for evil and corruption in our elections; and whereas the unbridled traffic in spirituous liquors promotes contentions, riots, ignorance, and poverty; and whereas the iniquity of alcoholism is visited through the parent "upon the third and fourth generations;" and whereas the effects of alcoholism are filling our prisons, houses of correction, and institutions of charity with criminals and sufferers and covering the land with woe and misery: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That on and after the 4th day of July, 1876, no person shall produce that substance known as ethyl alcohol, hydrated oxide of ethyl, or spirit of wine, or any other intoxicating liquor which can be produced by the fermentation of grain, starch, molasses, or sugar, including all dilutions and mixtures of this substance; nor shall any intoxicating liquors of any description whatever be imported into the United States after the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately after the passage of this act advertise in twenty prominent newspapers, printed in as many cities in the United States, for proposals for citizens of the United States to manufacture distilled spirits for scientific, mechanical, and medicinal purposes, and to be sold, as nearly as may be, at the cost price, for scientific, mechanical, and medicinal purposes alone, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time direct.

SEC. 3. That the advertisement published under the preceding section must describe the kind of spirits required and must require the proposals to be accompanied with sufficient security for their performance.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, by the 4th day of July, 1876, notify the lowest bidder whose sureties are deemed sufficient of the acceptance of his proposals.

SEC. 5. That nothing in the preceding sections shall prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from contracting from time to time for such distilled spirits as may be necessary to meet the demands for scientific, mechanical, and medicinal purposes.

SEC. 6. That nothing in the preceding sections shall be construed so as to limit the time of any license for the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors which is at present operating: Provided, That no extension of time nor any new license shall be hereafter granted for the sale of any intoxicating liquors.

And if this conference report on the river and harbor appropriation bill is as lacking in justice and as unworthy of public approval as the claim of the democratic party to confidence and support on the gound that it is a "reform party" is puerile and audacious, then I ask in all sincerity, is this such a bill as merits our approval? I think it is not; and I hope it will lie upon the table or be referred to the Committee on Commerce with instructions to report at the next session of Congress. By that time I trust we shall be able to do what is fair and just to all sections and make appropriations for such improvements only as are of great national importance.

By a wise and economical administration of the Government the republican party has maintained the national credit, reduced the public debt over $600,000,000 during the last ten years, and in that length of time has reduced the expenditures of the Government $1,058,500,000, and reduced the taxation on the people $303,600,000.

I will insert as a part of my remarks some carefully prepared tables, as given by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Mr. FOSTER:

From customs receipts the loss during Jackson's time from 1834 to 1837 on $1,000 was $17.26; in Van Buren's time, $3.93; in Grant's administration, two cents' loss on each $1,000.

From January 1, 1834, to June 30, 1861, the losses were $2.23 per $1,000; from July 1, 1861, to June 30, 1875, during republican administrations, fourteen cents per $1,000. The internal-revenue system did not exist during democratic administrations. The losses per $1,000 of receipts have been $1.70; from miscellaneous sources during Jackson's term, $2.75 per $1,000; during Van Buren's service, $4.76 per $1,000; during Buchanan's time, $12.09; and now, General Grant's term, sixty-nine cents per $1,000! The average losses during democratic administrations, $4.53 per thousand; in republican administration, $1.30 per thousand.

On the total receipts from all sources the loss during democratic administrations was $2.09; during republican administration, thirty-four cents.

* * * * * * *

REDUCTION OF PUBLIC EXPENDITURES.

The following table shows the expenditures of the Government for the fiscal years from 1865 to 1876, inclusive, with the reduction each year from 1865:

1865	$1,297,555,224 41	maximum.
1866	520,809,416 99	reduction	$776,745,807 42
1867	357,542,675 16	reduction	163,266,741 83
1868	377,340,284 86	increase	19,797,609 70
1869	322,865,277 80	reduction	54,475,007 06
1870	309,653,560 75	reduction	13,211,717 05
1871	292,177,188 25	reduction	17,476,372 50
1872	277,517,962 67	reduction	14,659,225 58
1873	290,345,245 33	increase	12,827,282 66
1874	287,133,873 17	reduction	3,211,372 16
1875	274,623,392 84	reduction	12,510,480 33
1876	258,500,000 00	reduction	16,123,302 84

While this constant reduction was going on Congress gradually reduced taxation, making the reduction of expenses and the reduction of taxation go hand in hand. Our present pretended reformers pretend to large reduction of expenses, but are not willing to reduce taxes.

This illustrates the difference between the policies of the two parties now contending for supremacy.

The following table shows the dates of the acts of Congress reducing taxes and of the amount of the annual reduction:

REDUCTION OF TAXES BY ACTS OF CONGRESS.

The following exhibits the estimated reduction of annual internal taxation and customs duties under the laws mentioned:

Act of July 13, 1866	$65,000,000 00
Act of March 2, 1867	40,000,000 00
Act of February 3, 1868	23,000,000 00
Acts of March 1, and July 20, 1868	45,000,000 00
Act of July 14, 1870	78,848,827 33
Acts of May 1 and June 6, 1872	51,823,761 38

The republican party may well look back to such deeds with pride; and the democratic party, which is the party of treason and rebellion, must take the responsibility for our enormous public debt and the burden of taxation which is saddled upon the people in consequence of the late war, and as the price of liberty, freedom, and union.

The democratic party has an overwhelming majority in this House. Out of that majority, let the country remember the fact that forty-four can boast of a war record; that they fought as brigadier-generals, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains, and the Lord only knows what not, for the "stars and bars" and the "lost cause," which did not succeed in laying its corner-stone in human slavery. And, sir, out of these forty-four who occupy seats on this floor by the grace and magnanimity of the republican party, some have gained unenviable notoriety for putting conundrums to the President and some for attempting to smirch the characters of prominent and great men not of their own party.

They have done more investigating, at great expense to the people, and proved less in proportion to the fuss made than any set of men who ever conspired to carry out a project by which they expected to thrust themselves into power.

To get up an excitement, to slip into power and get away with the plunder, à la Jeff. Davis and Floyd, are the objects of all their investigations and by them "a consummation most devoutly to be wished." Since they could not set up a separate government of their own they strive to secure the control of that Government which they sought, but ingloriously failed, to destroy. To accomplish their purpose they have been assigned to the dirty work of throwing mud, and have succeeded in transforming their committees of investigation into mud-machines. Upon investigation, however, as many democrats happen to be caught engaged in questionable transactions as there are republicans. There is a Pendleton for every Belknap. But when a democrat is caught or scented you see these committees jump back and squat upon their haunches as does a dog when, in hunting for other game, he unexpectedly finds a snake in the grass. There is no concealing the fact that numbers of republicans have been investigated for political effect by various committees of this House with an abandon and spirit of party hate unworthy of fair-minded and honorable men.

Mr. Speaker, it is now more than six months since Congress assembled. Before we met the whole people of the United States awaited, with hope or doubt or distrust, the results of our assembling and our action. Now they are satiated. They are thoroughly disgusted. What have we done to cheapen transportation between the East and the West? Nothing. What have we done to revive the drooping and perishing industries of the country? Nothing. What have we done to fill up the "bloody chasm" by restoring peace in the South and establishing confidence and good-will throughout our excited country? Nothing. Where have we retrenched? What reforms have we introduced? We have had a splendid opportunity to reduce salaries. Why have we not done it? Because we are not in earnest enough to strike our own salaries; and because to reduce the salaries of others poorer paid than ourselves would be basely mean. We are too cowardly to reduce the enormous salaries received by all of us who are paid out of the public Treasury.

All this democratic howl about retrenchment and reform is full of falsehood and patent insincerity.

By the faithlessness of a former republican Congress you slipped into power. By your own blunders, bad faith, and incompetency you will go out of power at the earliest opportunity.

We shall await the verdict of the people to be expressed in November, feeling confident that it will be announced to you democratic reformers—

Depart, ye workers of iniquity, into everlasting darkness, prepared for the devil and his angels.

Let us look hopefully to the future. With Hayes and Wheeler elected and a Congress republican in both its branches, after 4th of March next we may confidently expect a revival of business in every industrial pursuit, and a peace, prosperity, and happiness which a democratic victory can never insure.

Look up, look forth, and on!
  There's light in the dawning sky;
The clouds are parting, the night is gone;
  Prepare for the work of the day!
Fallow thy pastures lie
  And far thy shepherds stray,
And the fields of thy vast domain
  Are waiting for pure seed
  Of knowledge, desire, and deed,
For keener sunshine and mellower rain!
  But keep thy garments pure;
Pluck them back, with the old disdain,
From the touch of the hands that stain!
  So shall thy strength endure—
Transmute into good the gold of gain,
  Compel to beauty thy ruder powers,
  Till the country of coming hours
Shall plant on thy fields apart
With the oak of toil, the rose of art!
  Be watchful, and keep us so;
  Be strong, and fear no foe;
  Be just, and the world shall know!
With the same love, love us as we give;
  And the day shall never come
  That finds us weak or dumb
  To join and smite and cry
  In the great task, for thee to die,
And the greater task, for thee to live!

River and Harbor Bill.

SPEECH OF PETER D. WIGGINTON,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 10, 1876,

On the river and harbor bill.

Mr. WIGGINTON. Mr. Speaker, the interests of this country demand that a measure of this character should be favorably considered by Congress. I am not disposed to antagonize any suggestion that contemplates the improvement of our commerce or the protection of the laborers on the sea. Every avenue leading to the markets of the world should so far as possible be relieved from obstructions.

I rejoice that I have the honor to represent an essentially agricultural population. Of the generous wealth of their soil, of its really wonderful productive capacity, it is, I am proud to say, unnecessary for me to speak. I have no doubt, however, that the authorized statistics of the wealth of this Government will abundantly testify. I do not hesitate to challenge an honest and fair comparison with any portion of our much-favored Republic. Every measure tending to sustain, advance, and promote the material welfare of those I have the honor to represent it is my duty as well as my pleasure to advocate, here or elsewhere, and that I will endeavor to do on this occasion to the utmost of my ability. So far I am not conscious that I have neglected to do my duty. And in opposing this bill I feel that I am pursuing the line of conduct heretofore adopted and pursued by me, not only toward my constituents, but toward the entire Union.

We must not, certainly we should not, forget that this is a Union of co-equal States, each contributing to the support of the other and the maintenance of our common country, each entitled to the same rights, the same privileges, and the same benefits. There should be no class or no special legislation. If this measure was fair, was equal, was general, and not special and local in its features, I would be of its most ardent supporters. I repeat that I indorse the principle it contains, but repudiate the abuses its adoption must necessarily engender.

California, ever devoted and true to the best interests of this country, cheerfully contributes her full proportion to the general fund. Is she then not entitled to receive proportionate benefits in return? Is it right to rob Peter to pay Paul; no matter if the latter be the fair though illegitimate child of the grand old mother of Presidents, or the twin sister of the lakes; or Minnesota, in whose praise the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] so kindly spoke to the disparagement of California; or even the Empire State, that has always been a beneficiary of the General Government?

No, Mr. Speaker, California is entitled to her proportion, and so are other States that have been totally ignored or partially denied any advantage by this bill. I will speak no further for my State, but will address myself to you, Mr. Speaker, and this House, for my own district. Independent of States with single representatives I represent the largest district in this Union. It has an area of more than one hundred thousand square miles; larger, if I recollect aright, than all the New England States and the great Empire State included, containing a population of nearly if not quite two hundred and fifty thousand honest, industrious, independent, and self-supporting people, possessing a property valued at more than a quarter of a thousand million dollars, and that, too, in Jacksonian coin—good old gold and silver. It is capable of comfortably sustaining within its limits millions of people, a population even double that of the whole country at the time our ancestors asserted their independence.

I represent all of the Pacific coast from the city of San Francisco (the commercial center and the destined metropolis of the world) south to the Mexican border, a sea-coast line of more than nine hundred miles. Should I speak, not alone for my district, but in a general way, I would be right in saying that this bill is unjustly partial, discriminating in favor of certain localities; giving munificently to some, while it denies any and everything to others, in my judgment equally deserving. In some instances it appropriates money where little if any good can be obtained for enterprises mainly speculative in their character. In others it omits appropriations where the demand is imperative and the resultant benefits would be very great.

I do not mean to be invidious in my comparisons, but I must call attention to certain peculiarly prominent and glaringly partial items in this bill. It gives the large sum of $270,000 for the improvement of Fox and Wisconsin Rivers. Now, sir, I apprehend there is not a Representative from the State of Wisconsin, (for they are candid men,) but must admit that every dollar appropriated for the improvement of the Wisconsin River is just so much money thrown away. I will not undertake thus to speak of the Fox River. But as to the Wisconsin, I know whereof I speak, and I do not think it could be made navigable by the expenditure of a sum equal to that of our unfortunately large national debt. And further I do know that not one hundred thousand dollars' worth of commerce passes over it in a year. It is not navigable to even the smallest steamers, and fails absolutely in being an avenue of transportation, except to float a few rafts of lumber. I repeat, sir, it has no commerce, and can never have any. Millions have been expended in the experiment to improve it and nothing has been accomplished. Yet, sir, the experiment goes on, and the worst feature of all is, that for the improvement of the fifteen hundred miles of our Pacific coast not one dollar is appropriated.

There should be shipped from the port of Monterey, California, this year many hundreds of thousands of bushels of surplus produce, and it would be so shipped and consumed in the markets of the world but for the want of an expenditure of a few thousand dollars upon the harbor at that place. By failure to make the appropriation of the paltry sum of $12,000 in this bill the farmers in that vicinity are compelled to ship their surplus products to San Francisco by rail, a long distance, at a very large expense to the poor farmers, and therefore to the still poorer consumer, benefiting only the railroad companies and injuring the people.

West Virginia, with a commerce not equaling one-tenth that of Southern California, receives $277,300. And when appropriations are given to California it is for the purpose of attempting to build a harbor inside the finest harbor in the world. Just think of it; building a harbor at Oakland, within the bay of San Francisco itself, and that, too, upon private property, as I am informed, while the Wilmington Harbor, in Los Angeles County, California, upon which the Government has already expended considerable money, and through which passes nearly all of the commerce of that immense territory, comprising the counties of Los Angeles, San Bernardino, Inyo, and a portion of San Diego, and the Territory of Arizona, a commerce amounting to millions per annum, is refused a dollar, so that the great expense of lighterage, now necessarily incurred, might be obviated, and an expense to the producers of many thousands of dollars per annum be avoided. I observe that an appropriation of $20,000 is given for the improvement of the Missouri River above the mouth of the Yellowstone, a river running through a wilderness where there is not now and cannot for many years to come be any commerce.

I could very properly, if disposed to contrast, call attention to the refusal to appropriate the insignificant sum of $15,000 for the improvement of the Sacramento River, over which pass millions of money, invested in commerce, every year, and the improvement of which is of the utmost importance, and the appropriation of $20,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi above Saint Anthony's Falls; and, again, $10,000 for the improvement of the Chippewa River, Wisconsin, over which there can be but very little commerce. But it is not necessary that I should follow the comparison further. I mean to be just toward every section, and without further comment I respectfully invite attention to some of the strikingly partial features of this bill. Among others the following States enjoy special favor: Wisconsin receives $354,000; Michigan, $362,000; West Virginia, $277,300; New York, $373,000; Minnesota, $175,000; and the improvement of the Tennessee River, $270,000; while California, with her more than fifteen hundred miles of sea-coast and two important rivers, with a commerce exceeding either of the above-named States excepting New York, receives but $95,000—$75,000 of that to improve a harbor within the harbor of San Francisco.

Right here I will incorporate that portion of the report of Colonel G. H. Mendell which refers to the improvement of the harbor at Wilmington, California, and shows the importance thereof, content that it will develop that spirit of discrimination of which I now complain:

2. Breakwater at Wilmington, California.—Lieutenant Sears has made, during the year, three careful hydrographic surveys of the entrance to Wilmington Harbor, each of which has exhibited an improvement in the depth of water as compared with any preceding survey, and jointly they afford an interesting study of the steps by which the tidal forces excavate for themselves a sufficient channel. These forces, unaided, except by the constructions of the past four years, have increased the depth at the entrance more than four feet. There is now a depth at mean low water of quite six feet.

This process will be materially expedited by dredging, which, however, has not been carried out quite as successfully as was hoped, only 24,087 cubic yards having been excavated. The dredging is still progressing, and will be continued until a depth of ten feet is secured.

The sand has formed along the work in a favorable manner, but with not so much rapidity as was anticipated. A portion of the timber-work was thus exposed to the attacks of marine insects, which in these waters are very destructive. It became necessary to protect this timber-work, about 1,000 feet in length, by covering it with stone and gravel. This has been partially accomplished, and is still in progress.

The funds available are sufficient to carry out the project as originally designed; but the large increase of commerce which has taken place would justify an extension of the work so as to secure a depth of fifteen feet at mean low water, for which the sum of $100,000 is required.

WILMINGTON HARBOR, CALIFORNIA.

The subjoined extracts from a report by First-Lieutenant Clinton B. Sears, who has been in immediate charge of the operations at Wilmington, gives a clear account of the condition of the work and of its details during the year.

A careful inspection of the double work of timber, made in March, proved that it had been attacked by marine insects, which in these waters are countless in numbers and exceedingly destructive in their operations.

This wall had not been covered by sand to the extent that had been anticipated, and for this reason the timber had been much exposed. It was thought best to protect this timber without delay, and Lieutenant Sears was directed to procure stone for this purpose.

There has been a steady improvement in the depth of water in the channel, which has been proved by these careful surveys. There is now a depth of six feet at mean low water, which is more than four feet better than at the commencement of the work. This depth is independent of dredging, and results from the construction alone.

There is now no reason to doubt the full success of this improvement as it was originally projected, and at a cost which will differ but little from the original estimate, which, in view of the exposure and risk of many of the operations, must be regarded as very satisfactory. The depth which it was originally intended to secure was 10 feet at mean low water.

We may soon expect this depth. It may, however, be a question whether the large increase of commerce, which is shown by the exhibit hereto appended, will not justify an increase of depth. A further increase of 5 feet will make an entrance that would accommodate the vessels trading to this point in a very satisfactory manner.

It may be remarked that, owing to the extension of the deep water seaward by the action of natural causes, this further increase of depth will not cost proportionally as much as the previous deepening. In illustration of this extension of depth seaward, it may be stated that the six-foot curve of depth has advanced 2,000 feet, the seven-foot 1,500 feet, and the eight-foot curve 1,100 feet in the past year.

There is good reason for stating that $100,000 properly expended would nearly, if not quite, secure a depth at the entrance of 15 feet at mean low water, this sum being in addition to the funds now available.

The operations of the coming year will consist of dredging, which is now under contract; the protection of the double work, which is under progress; and the regulation of the channel by jetties or training-walls.

No appropriation is asked for the next year.

The following are extracts from the annual report of First Lieutenant C. B. Sears, Corps of Engineers:

"During the present year the natural banking of the sand against the outside of the timber-work has not been nearly as rapid as in the preceding year, so that in high-water embankment but little has been gained in the direction of the length, but much in width and height, so that, practically, Rattlesnake Island has extended out bodily along the outside of the work (and is due to its presence) to a distance of 2,500 feet, having an elevation to high-water mark and above and an average width of 250 feet. Over about half of this area a creeping sand-plant, peculiar, or rather quite common, on this coast, has got a fine foothold, and the top surface is rapidly being shifted into dunes, which are also rendered to a great extent stable by these plants. Beyond the present head of the island, (2,500 feet point of the work,) the sand has during this past year banked up to half-tide on the rest of the single work and for about half of the double work, thus securing these portions against the attack of the worms. The single-work portion of this sand embanking had previously been riprapped to half-tide with stone, which, however, did not keep out the worms, but acted as a catcher of the sand, which has filled into the interstices. The banking against the double work has taken place within the last six weeks and is due to some crib-wings recently built. The remaining half is banked with sand to about 1½ feet above mean low water, and the action is going on, so that another year will probably see the double work as effectually protected from the worms with sand as is the single work; but to provide against accidents the riprap on the outside of the double work has been raised from 1 to 3 feet throughout its length of 1,000 feet, and nearly one-third of the vacant volume inside the double work, 6′ by 10′ by 1,000′, has been filled with rock.

"At the close of last year the six-foot curve on the inside of the bar had, through natural causes, namely, the scour of the currents, advanced to about 200 feet beyond jetty No. 1. During the past year this curve has advanced 2,000 feet farther toward the sea, overlapping somewhat the six-foot curve outside the bar; the width of the six-foot area averages over 200 feet, so that there is now practically a good six-foot channel clear through and lying in the most favorable place. The seven-foot curve has advanced 1,500 feet and the eight-foot curve some 1,100 feet.

"It is estimated that the natural scour of the current during the past year has saved the removal by dredging of some 30,000 cubic yards of sand.

"WORK DONE DURING THE YEAR.

"Dredging.—On the 23d of July, 1874, a contract was closed with Mr. Boschke for dredging a channel across the bar. This required him to begin work on the 15th of September. His time was extended twice, to September 25 and again to October 13. He got into position October 13, started his sand-pump dredges on the 16th, which proved a signal failure; he on the 17th started his dipper and took out about half a scow-load of sand. He worked along doing little or nothing for about a month, when he broke down entirely and took off his machinery and started to build a new dredger.

"The contractor did not resume operations until February 5, 1875, since which time he has been working slowly, but somewhat steadily, and has excavated and deposited up to date 24,087 cubic yards of sand.

"He began work at the ten-foot curve inside the bar and made a cut giving 10 feet at mean low water over a width of 220 feet and for a length of 400 feet; from here the cut narrowed, till, at 200 feet farther, it was only 120 feet wide; from here the cut inside the bar was stopped and the dredger was moved outside the bar, into the ten-foot curve, where a cut to connect the outside and inside six-foot channels was begun. Work here began May 1, and to date a cut 60 feet wide and 560 feet long, and carried down to ten feet mean low water, has been made. These cuts have essentially maintained their width and depth, barring an unavoidable back-filling, for which extra depth was made, and on the outside cut some sloping off on the bar side, where the bank was very abrupt.

"On the main work.—The gap in the single work, 130 feet long and 3 feet deep, heretofore left open and furnished with tide-gates, has been built up flush with the rest of the work and the tide-gates removed. The point of junction of the work and island (initial point of work) has been strengthened by a bulkhead of timber and gravel some 30 feet long, 5 feet thick, and 4 feet high, built in the prolongation of the axis of the work and carried well into the high grounds. This cuts off the high-water wash around the head of the work.

"Two gravel dams, 40 feet long, 3 feet thick on top, and from 2 to 4 feet high, have been built at right angles to the single work, one three hundred odd feet from the initial point, the other about 200 feet farther out, and both on the sea-side, to cut off a high-water channel, which ran along parallel to the work and which had been scooped out by the reflex action of the wind over the top of the work.

"The breach at the head of and inside the work has been riprapped with gravel and cobble-stones over a length of 250 feet. The timber work in the third gap has been banked up with gravel on both sides; eight cribs, 6′×24′×10′, have been built and put into position outside the double work, forming four crib-wings, 48 feet long each, and which will, as the sand accumulates, be built up to the top of the work. Two thousand four hundred tons (2 240 pounds each) of rock and 1,375 (2,240 pounds each) of gravel have been purchased in open market, and applied as follows, namely: of the gravel, 950 tons have been put into the third gap, and the balance used in the dams, bulkhead, and in riprapping the beach. Of the rock, 420 tons have gone into sinking and securing crib-wings, 735 tons have been put into the double work, and the balance as a riprap outside the double work.

"Incidental work.—The channel for the dredger has been kept plainly marked, first by buoys and afterward by beacons and ranges, and a large number of beacons and ranges have been built and planted to facilitate surveys of the harbor.

"Three close and accurate hydrographic surveys of the bar have been made. A series of current observations have been made to determine the force and direction of the currents in different parts of the harbor, with a view to the most advantageous location of the mouth of the channel. A lot of borings have been made to estimate and determine the shape and amount of rock lying in the channel.

COMMERCIAL STATISTICS.

For the following data I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Hewitt, superintendent; Mr. McCrea, auditor, and Mr. Smurr, freight auditor, of the Los Angeles branch of the Southern Pacific Railroad, through whose jurisdction all the commerce of the country at present passes.

Of the imports in 1874, 13,903 tons were railroad plant, iron ties, cars, &c.; and in 1873, 17,007 tons.

Year.	Imports.	Exports.	Total tonnage.	No. of sailing vessels arrived and departed.	No. of steamers arrived and departed.
	Tons.	Tons.
1874	57,034	18,056	75,090	94	352
1873	41,390	12,239	53,638	80	159

1870	22,320	7,050	27,370	56	147

The principal imports are lumber, general merchandise, and agricultural implements. The minor imports are cordwood, horses, cattle, and sheep.

The principal exports are wines and liquors, wool, and fruits, (oranges, lemons, limes, grapes, figs, and English walnuts,) and bullion, though the amount of the latter will hereafter for a number of years be nothing, as the freighting of this article has been diverted to the Bakersfield route. The minor exports are the cereals, (barley, wheat, corn and beans,) honey, borax, asphaltum, (brea,) pelts, and hides, (dry and salt.)

Mr. Hewitt gives the opinion that the amount of tonnage in and out of the county during the six months ending June 30, 1875, exceeds either six months in 1874 fully 20 per cent.

Respectfully submitted.

CLINTON B. SEARS,
First Lieutenant of Engineers.

Major G. H. MENDELL,
Corps of Engineers, U. S. A.

The economy and retrenchment originated in this end of the Capitol have, in this single instance, much to my regret and to the injury of the country, been taken up at the other end of this building and in remodeling this bill have been carried to an extreme which must certainly receive the condemnation of the people.

The Senate seemed determined to out-economize our most fearless and earnest economists, and in this the distinguished senior Senator from my State has cordially and too successfully lent his very potential aid. So economical has he become that he has not only permitted, without opposition, but in some instances aided in crippling the commerce of the Pacific coast by refusing to maintain in the Senate appropriations initiated in this House for the improvement of our harbors and rivers.

This House, with economy and retrenchment constantly in their mind, and of which they were continually being reminded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] not to mention many other honest, earnest, and distinguished economists upon this floor, could not and did not refuse some appropriations for such important interests. And this bill passed this House with appropriations of $30,000 for Wilmington Harbor, $12,000 for Monterey Harbor, and $15,000 for the Sacramento and Feather Rivers; these very important improvements demanding quite as much consideration as any and certainly more than many favorably considered in this bill.

Why, sir, one would have supposed that the Senate, which has become so indignant at our efforts to fix the salaries of Department clerks at a fraction less than they have been heretofore, who have intimated a disposition to keep us here all summer before they will yield to a reduction of $500 per annum upon their own and our salaries, would have cheerfully granted the paltry $57,000 to such important improvements, the expenditure of which would have been of vast benefit, saving hundreds of thousands of dollars to the people of a State which has ever cheerfully paid its full proportion to the support of the General Government. They have chosen to do differently for reasons no doubt satisfactory to themselves, however much this House or the people may differ with them. And I feel that nothing which I, or others who may view this measure in the same light with myself, can do will at this late day of the session remedy the error which, in my opinion, they have committed.

And now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, having from the beginning done all in my power to make this bill more just and less discriminating in its character, after a careful examination of the measure, giving it full and I believe impartial consideration, I must say I find it not only disregarding the just claims of my own State, but also as well the interests of other States, and therefore I do not hesitate to record my vote against it.

Extravagance and Corruption of the Administration.

SPEECH OF HON. F. HEREFORD,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 12, 1876,

On extravagance and corruption of the Administration.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. Speaker, during the year 1868 the number of failures in the United States was 2,608; in the year 1869, 2,790; 1870, 3,551; 1871, 2,915; 1872, 4,060; 1873, 5,183; 1874, 5,830; 1875, 7,740; and during the first three months of 1876 it was 2,806, or at the rate of 11,224 per annum.

And to-day we find the following in the Boston Post:

The list of mills stopped in New England is reported in the Boston Advertiser at over one million spindles, and the additions in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, with more to be heard from in Rhode Island and Connecticut, at 200,000, or 12½ per cent. of the usual production. The spindles stopped are one-half on print-cloths, and represent a production of 55,000 pieces a week. Compared with the returns for previous years, the present production is less than would have been sufficient for any season since 1872.

And also the following:

EFFECTS OF DULL TIMES.

To-day all the mills of Fall River cut down 10 per cent. in the wages of operatives. Much dissatisfaction is felt by the hands, and although but comparatively little is said it is easy to see that the feeling is intense among the operatives. Manufacturers say this cut-down is their only alternative; they must either do it or close up. The Sprague mills in Cranston and other parts of Rhode Island are either closed or running with small help. At Baltic the mills shut down Saturday night, and one thousand operatives were thrown out of employment. It is expected that there will be another suspension of A. & W. Sprague & Co., (now in the hands of Zachariah Chaffee, trustee,) on account of default of interest on extension notes for July.

So that in the short space of nine years, if the failures continue for the balance of this year at the rate of the first three months, we will have 45,871, which is unprecedented in the history of our country. During all this time, under the policy of the republican party, the volume of currency has been steadily diminishing.

Notwithstanding this alarming state of affairs, penury and starvation at the doors of our constituents, urged on by the money power, this same party in 1875 passed what is known as the resumption act, which has increased the contraction, forcing national banks to surrender their charters, to go out of existence, and these banks thereby forced to draw in their loans from the people. This most oppressive law, the resumption act, was forced through the House of Representatives under the suspension of the rules, thereby depriving the democratic members from all right of amendment or the right of speech, the right to expose its enormities and prostrating and direful effects upon the people. A few days since, after a great struggle in favor of an oppressed people, a democratic House passed a bill repealing it, but it sleeps in a republican Senate; and there it will continue to sleep until an outraged people rise in the might and majesty of their power and compel that body to listen to the demands of the people for relief. This resumption act forces or attempts to force resumption of specie payments in 1879.

Where is the coin to come from? Business men of every kind, farmers, laborers, debtors, where will you get the gold?

I say gold for the reason that this same party in February, 1873, demonetized silver.

By the terms of the Constitution and from the foundation of our present form of government gold and silver both have been a legal tender in payment of all debts. At the time of the creation of our present national debt, a great part of which is held in Europe, it could be paid either in gold, silver, or greenbacks; that is, the principal. On the back of every greenback was and is still printed these word:

This note is a legal tender at its face value for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt.

But at a subsequent period this same party passed a law by which the principal must be paid in coin. The laborer, the clerk in the Departments, the soldier who risked his life for his country, and the pensioner must take greenbacks, but the bondholder must have his coin.

When they had gone thus far in the interest of the bondholder you would think they had gone far enough; but the half has not been told. A more disgraceful chapter in the history of our country is yet to be read. In February, 1873, this same republican Congress, still in the power of the foreign bondholder and legislating for his interest and against that of their own country, their own confiding constituency, passed an act demonetizing silver, depriving it of its legal-tender quality, so that to-day the rapacious bondholders must and can be paid in gold and gold alone.

And the darkest, most disgraceful page in that chapter is the manner of the passage of the law, the means resorted to; the fraudulent and high-handed means was only equaled by the object accomplished; the bill depriving silver of its legal-tender quality was passed without ever being read; its reading was demanded by such sterling democrats as our present Speaker, Mr. KERR, and Mr. HOLMAN, but it was refused. I do not use too strong language when I say it was passed by fraud, tyrannical power, and deceit. One of the authors of this deed is dead and the other sick; therefore I say no more, but embody in my remarks the proceedings of Congress on May 27, 1872, and can be found of that date in the CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE, and on page 3883, and is as follows:

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose it is intended to have the bill read before it is put its passage.
The SPEAKER. The substitute will be read.
Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I hope not. It is a long bill, and those who are interested in it are perfectly familiar with its provisions.
Mr. KERR. The rules cannot be suspended so as to dispense with the reading of the bill.
The SPEAKER. They can be.
Mr. KERR. I want the House to understand that it is attempted to put through this bill without being read.
The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] move that the reading of the bill be dispensed with?
Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I will so frame my motion to suspend the rules that it will dispense with the reading of the bill.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the rules be suspended and that the bill pass, the reading thereof being dispensed with.
Mr. RANDALL. Cannot we have a division of that motion?
The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules cannot be divided.
Mr. RANDALL. I should like to have the bill read, although I am willing that the rules shall be suspended as to the passage of the bill.
The question was put on suspending the rules and passing the bill without reading; and (two-thirds not voting therefor) the rules were not suspended.
Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I now move that the rules be suspended and the substitute for the bill in relation to mints and coinage passed; and I ask that the substitute be read.
The Clerk began to read the substitute.
Mr. BROOKS. Is that the original bill?
The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] applies to the substitute, and that on which the House is called to act is being read.
Mr. BROOKS. As there is to be no debate, the only chance we have to know what we are doing is to have both the bill and the substitute read.
The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts being to suspend the rules and pass the substitute, it gives no choice between the two bills. The House must either pass the substitute or none.
Mr. BROOKS. How can we choose between the original bill and the substitute unless we hear them both read?
The SPEAKER. The gentleman can vote "ay" or "no" on the question whether this substitute shall be passed.
Mr. BROOKS. I am very much in the habit of voting "no" when I do not know what is going on.
Mr. HOLMAN. Before the question is taken upon suspending the rules and passing the bill, I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will explain the leading changes made by this bill in the existing law, especially in reference to the coinage. It would seem that all the small coinage of the country is intended to be recoined.
Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. This bill makes no changes in the existing law in that regard. It does not require the recoinage of the small coins.
The question being taken on the motion of Mr. Hooper, of Massachusetts, to suspend the rules and pass the bill, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 110, noes 13.

From which it will be seen that Mr. HOLMAN used the following language:

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose it is intended to have the bill read before it is put on passage.
Mr. HOOPER. I hope not.

Whereupon Mr. KERR said:

The rules cannot be suspended so as to dispense with the reading of the bill.

Whereupon the Speaker (then Mr. Blaine) said:

They can be.

And the bill was passed without ever being read.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to all liberty-loving, fair-dealing men on this floor and through them to every American citizen if they will tolerate such a high-handed outrage. Silver at that time constituted about one-half of the coin of this country and of the world, and nearly one-half of all the silver produced in the world is the product of the United States. Yet we see by the assistance of a republican Speaker a republican House passed an act driving it out of circulation by one fell swoop, and would not even allow the bill to be read. Why are we sent here? Why do we occupy these seats? Is it to be compelled to enact laws without their ever being read? Is this the kind of deliberative body we have? Will the American people tolerate such high-handed measures?

Is it then any wonder that there is such a cry of hard times all over the land? Return to specie payments with one-half of your specie surreptitiously legislated out of existence! The whole people feel and feel grievously this monetary pressure; they feel the scarcity of money, and all wonder why it is so, but few know the real cause. Prices of all articles are regulated by the scarcity or abundance of coin. As I said heretofore, it is estimated that the gold and silver coin of the world are about equal in value. Is there any plainer proposition than that if you destroy one-half of it you thereby reduce by one-half the value or price of every article; the merchant's goods, the real estate, the farmer's wheat and corn, the grazier's cattle, and laborer's wages? It has been charged upon the floor of this House, and not denied, that this bill demonetizing silver was drawn up by an Englishman. We know one thing, that very soon after silver was demonetized in this country the same policy was adopted in Germany and England. In 1873 silver was demonetized, one-half of our coin practically destroyed. In 1873 the financial panic came upon us like a fire-bell in the night. Comment is unnecessary. In 1875 the resumption act was passed, the panic had spread, and dismay and distress are seen and felt all over our fair land.

On February 11, 1876, on the floor of this House, Mr. Blaine, when speaking for another purpose, unwittingly told the truth of the great cause of all our troubles. He used the following language:

In other words, what we most need as the outgrowth of legislation is confidence, public and private, general and individual.

In other words, the cause of all our trouble is want of confidence, want of confidence public and private, general and individual; want of confidence in the national Legislature, want of confidence in the Executive, heads of Departments, and their subordinates.

The same gentleman said:

Why, Mr. Chairman, it is hardly an exaggeration that ever since the Government was compelled to resort to irredeemable currency during the war the assembling of Congress and its continuance in session have been the most disturbing elements in the business of the country. It is literally true, no man can tell what a day may bring forth.

Mark the words: "The assembling of Congress and its continuance in session have been the most disturbing elements in the business of the country." But during all this time the republican party had absolute control of both Houses, and a great portion of the time a two-thirds vote. The democratic party declared the issuance of legal-tenders unconstitutional and unnecessary. For saying so we were denounced as "disloyal," "copperheads," "rebels."

Now these same authors of that act themselves denounce it as "irredeemable trash." You forced it upon the people at its gold value, and now when the people have it and it is all they have you seek by every means to depreciate it and make it valueless. Is there not cause for want of confidence? But a short time ago when the Supreme Court had decided the legal-tenders unconstitutional, your party and your President were so much enamored of what you now call "irredeemable trash," that you packed the Supreme Court so as to change that decision. Again the same gentleman says:

When we had one hundred and fifty millions of legal-tender in circulation, it stood for a long while nearly at par with gold. As the issue increased in amount the depreciation was very rapid, and at the time we fixed the four-hundred-million limit, that whole vast sum had less purchasing power in exchange for lands, or houses, or merchandise than the hundred and fifty millions had two years before. In the spring of 1862, $150,000,000 of legal-tender would buy in the market $147,000,000 in gold coin. In June, 1864, $400,000,000 of legal-tenders would buy only $140,000,000 in gold coin.

But what party was in power? Who made the change? What party is responsible for issuing $400,000,000 legal-tenders when that $400,000,000 would not purchase as much as the $150,000,000 already out? Who is responsible for this squandering of $250,000,000, which together with its interest would to-day amount to $436,000,000, or one-fifth of the whole national debt? Is there any wonder there is a want of condfience?

Further on he says:

When the first three hundred millions of legal-tenders were issued, they could be funded at the option of the holder in 5.20 bonds in sums of $50 and any multiple thereof. This provision gave a fixed, determinate character to the legal-tender, connected it with other Government issues by an equated value, made it an integral part of our whole system of public credit, and established it, in short, as a sort of balance-wheel to our somewhat complicated financial machinery. So long as that provision was in force the money of the people was precisely as good and just the same as the money of the bondholder. By a mistaken policy, as I venture to affirm, this section of the law, on the request of Secretary Chase, was repealed after due notice given, and the moment that was done the legal-tender became a sort of financial orphan among us; it had thenceforward no connection or relationship with any other issue by the Government; it measured nothing itself and was measured by nothing, and ever since that day it has had to fight its own battle, not merely unaided by other forms of public credit, but in a sense constantly hindered by them.

He says so long as that provision (the convertibility clause) was in force the money of the people was precisely as good and just the same as the money of the bondholders; but who, what party made the change, made the money of the bondholder better than that of the people? Then I ask again is there any wonder that there is a want of confidence in your party by these people whose Representatives you are, whose money you have by your legislation made worth less than the money of the German and English bond-holders?

And so we might continue from Congress to Congress and we would see that nearly all the legislation has been in the interest of the bondholder and against the people. There have been constant changes and fluctuations of policy, so that no one knows what a day may bring forth.

But I must pass on.

Another one of the great causes of the present depressed condition of the country is the unparalleled extravagance of the Administration. On pages 11 and 12 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury we find the net ordinary receipts in the Treasury were as follows:

In the fiscal year—
1865	$322,031,158 19
1866	519,949,564 38
1867	462,846,672 92
1868	376,434,453 82
1869	357,188,256 09
1870	395,959,833 87
1871	374,431,104 94
1872	364,694,229 91
1873	322,177,673 78
1874	299,941,090 84
1875	284,020,771 41
Total	4,079,674,217 15

Which gives us in gross as the net ordinary receipts for these eleven years the enormous sum of $4,079,674,217.15. And now if we add $297,450,145.14, the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury as the net ordinary receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, we have $4,376,130,362.29 as the net ordinary receipts in the Treasury in the last twelve years.

By the same report, on page 8, we are told that the public debt of the United States was, in 1865, $2,680,647,869.72, and by the last monthly statement of the public debt published by the present Secretary of the Treasury we are told that the public debt of the United States was, on June 30, 1876, $2,203,550,345.31, which shows that during these twelve years the public debt has been diminished only $477,097,524.43, while during the same period there has been wrung from the hard earnings of the people $4,377,130,362.29. What has become of the other $3,900,032,827.86? By these figures, taken from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, we find that during these twelve years there has been received into the Treasury $1,696,482,492.55 more than the whole debt was in 1865, and yet we are in debt over two thousand millions of dollars!

Is there any wonder there is a want of confidence? Is there any wonder that there is a cry all over the land for retrenchment and reform?

But some may say that part of the year 1865 was during the war, and that the debt had not reached its maximum until 1866. So be it. Let us see, then, how the matter stands since the war. The same report shows that, leaving out the year 1865, we have received since that period, in a time of profound peace, $4,055,099,204.10, and the debt was only reduced $569,685,878.38, leaving a balance of receipts over expenditures since the war of $3,485,413,375.72 after subtracting the reduction of the public debt, and yet we are in debt over two thousand millions of dollars.

By the same report, on page 14, we find our expenditures for the Army in 1860 were only $16,472,202.72; in 1875, for the same purpose, $41,120,645.98. In 1860, for the Navy, $11,514,649.83; in 1874, for the same purpose, $30,932,587.42. The gross expenditures for all purposes in 1860 were only $77,055,125.64. Yet further, as shown by the same report, the net ordinary expenditures of the Government from 1791 to 1860 inclusive, in a period of seventy years, the net ordinary expenditures of the Government were $1,524,848,412.43, and from 1867 to 1875, a period of only nine years, the net ordinary expenses were $1,664,703,838.02. In neither case are included in these expenditures either interest on public debt, pensions, premiums, or expenditures for Indians, the War, or Navy Department. The figures are startling. But I must hurry on to a close.

During the short space I have had a seat on this floor I have seen five United States judges driven from their offices by fear of impeachment; our country disgraced through our representative at the last Vienna exposition; our minister to one of the proudest courts in the world forced to resign and now censured by the House of Representatives; the President's Private Secretary now answerable to our civil courts for misdeeds of a high character, and last, a Cabinet minister impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors and only escaping conviction and punishment by alleged want of jurisdicition.

Are not these things sufficient to bring the blush to the cheek of every American proud of his country? Are they not enough to cause "the ears of those who hear it tingle and the eyes of those who have seen it weep drops of blood?" Is it not high time that every honest man, every patriot, regardless of party, should give himself up for the approaching political battle for economy, purity, and good government? For "whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things * * * are of good report," are involved in the issue. If the spirits of the departed take notice of what is transpiring upon this earth, I believe Washington and his compatriots in arms are looking down upon us in this struggle and will bid us Godspeed.

Why the South is Democratic.

SPEECH OF HON. W. B. SPENCER,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 12, 1876,

On the reason why the South is democratic.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. Speaker, the gravest sin charged upon the people of the South by the republican party seems to be that they vote the democratic ticket. This is "the head and front of" our "offending." We can be forgiven any and all other transgressions but this one. That is the unpardonable sin for which there is no atonement. To expiate that transgression the South has been doomed to a slow but never-ending death. Her industries have been crushed, her future darkened, and people plundered by a hungry horde of avaricious adventurers. The sanctuaries of justice have been debased and corrupted, and liberty has become a mockery in some of her States.

Now these facts lead me to inquire why it is, under all the pressure of these severe ordeals, that people remain fixed and determined in their adhesion to the democratic party; for if it proceeds from a high sense and conviction of duty and from fidelity to the fundamental principles of the Constitution as we understand them, surely we do not merit the severe condemnation and punishment we have received, even though we are wrong. Humanity, "thy name is frailty," may be predicated of man as well as of the gentler sex.

To the philosophic student of our political history there is plainly discernible the well-defined lines of a continuous conflict, from the origin of our Government to the present day, between two extreme and equally erroneous ideas—"centralization" and "State sovereignty;" the one aiming at what is called a strong government, with all the functions of government massed in and exercised by one great central power; the other denying even the existence of that central power, and dwarfing it into a mere agency of the States, without vitality or the power of separate and independent existence. The marks of this conflict may be found all along the line of our national history on the extremes of one and the other political parties. The first found its adherents among the extreme federalists, among the extreme whigs, among the extreme native Americans, among the extreme abolitionists, and has finally and in this day as its exponents and apostles the entire and great republican party of the country, which seeks and demands the consolidation of all governmental powers in the hands of the Federal Government.

The other, State sovereignty, found its stronghold among extremists of the democratic party. It went to the extent of denying to the Federal Government a substantive, self-sustaining, and independent existence, and declared the absolute sovereignty of the States. But this theory of the extreme democrats never obtained acceptance by the masses of the democratic party as a party, as is evidenced by the stern rebuke given by General Jackson to nullification in South Carolina. The party as a general thing has stood firmly upon the doctrine that the Federal Government, within the limits prescribed by the Constitution, was a sovereignty, a government capable of independent existence and self-protection, and that its powers could not be revoked or nullified by the States, which were to the same extent entirely dependent and subordinate, but outside of these limits independent of all Federal supremacy. As we understand it there is where the democratic party stands to-day. It demands absolute obedience and subordination of the States to the Federal Government upon every subject over which the Constitution gives it jurisdiction. But it in turn demands of the Federal Government that it abstain from the exercise over the States or people of any authority not clearly embraced and conferred by the terms of its charter.

Whenever the limitations set by the Constitution to the powers of the States or of the Federal Government are broken down, disregarded, or overstepped in either direction, it is at the peril of our existence as a nation. If the States assume a sovereignty beyond that conferred, the Union is at an end and we are held together by a rope of sand. We become a disorganized, disorderly body of petty States, warring upon each other and ending in anarchy and despotism. If the Federal Government assumes to exercise powers not conferred, and encroaches upon the legitimate domain of the States, then the Union ceases to exist, and it is a misnomer to speak of it, for there are no States to be united. So that either extreme leads to the destruction of the Union, and the one no more than the other. The middle ground between these two extremes is in this, as in all things else, the only true one. And I claim that it is this middle ground, this solid and only basis of the Union, upon which the democratic party of to-day stands. True, there may be, and doubtless are, many men claiming to be democrats and acting with them who assert the extreme doctrine of State sovereignty; but they do not represent or speak for the democracy as a party. And I here declare that I have no more respect for the opinions of an extreme State sovereignty democrat than I have for those of an orthodox republican. Both tend to the destruction of the Union, and indirectly, but by opposite processes, to the subversion of free government.

The republican party came into life denouncing the Constitution as "a covenant with death and a league with hell," and was promptly met by its old opponent, State sovereignty. And as a consequence of of those two false theories came the war "and all our woe." The result of the war, the last and final arbiter, the ultima ratio, was the total annihilation of the State sovereignty theory. But unfortunately this victory was achieved by the opposite extreme, the theory of centralization and consolidation, under which States lose all but their autonomy, become mere subdivisions or departments of a grand central power having and exercising unlimited authority.

But as I said, if the doctrine of State sovereignty has been effectually killed by the war, and fortunately forever eliminated from our politics, its antagonist and antipode, centralization, is very far from dead. It has to-day as its exponent the republican party, a party that has been prolific of great men and characterized by an energy and coherency, an ability and audacity which will fit it for the work of revolutionizing the fundamental principles of our Government. Under its matured and developed existence, it has not hesitated to lay its mailed hand upon the most sacred provisions of the bill of rights and to trample under foot every right reserved by the Constitution to the States or people. In time of peace even it has set up military commissions for the trial of citizens, it has suspended the writ of habeas corpus, it has overcome the civil by the military power, it has by military order set up and abolished State governments, it has by force dispersed Legislatures, and sent its mailed warriors to clank their swords in State capitols and to drag from their seats obnoxious members of the Legislature. It has placed the military in the hands of its party leaders to raid upon and terrorize over its opponents, without warrant or legal process. Judging the republican party by its acts for the past ten years, its theory and practice totally abolished State existence. It has made fidelity and adhesion to its tenets and practices not only the test of official patronage, but that of loyalty to the Constitution itself. Measured by its dogmas as interpreted by its practices, there is no patriotism, no virtue outside of its charmed circle. In its eyes the Hancocks, the McClellans, the Custers, the Bannings, the Walkers, and even my maimed friend from Ohio [General RICE] are double-dyed rebels and traitors. In vain these gallant men point to their records and heroism in the cause of the Union. In vain they periled their lives in the fore-front of battle. They are not loyal to the republican party and are therefore necessarily false to their country.

> For them no minstrel raptures swell;
> And, doubly dying, shall go down
> To the vile dust from whence they sprung,
> Unwept, unhonor'd, and unsung.

But not only has that party made adhesion to its tenets the test of loyalty to the Government, but as a necessary sequence it has made fidelity to its chiefs the test of republican faith, and thereby dwarfed and metamorphosed the Government of the Constitution into a mere personal appendage of the President and his favorites. A man's fitness for office now is determined, not by the obsolete formula, "Is he capable and is he honest?" but by this, "Is he loyal to the republican party, and especially does he bear true faith and allegiance to the President and his boon companions? Is he willing to wear the Executive collar inscribed:

> "I am his highness's dog at Kew;
> Pray tell me, sir, whose dog are you?"

If he is unwilling to wear or even restive under this Executive badge of ownership, the fiat goes forth:

> Off with his head! so much for Buckingham!

But this fealty is expected and due not only to the party and its chief, but to the boon companions and choice spirits of the White House; to its Babcocks, its Harringtons, its Shepherds. No orthodox republican dares to rise in his place on this floor and raise his voice in protest or condemnation of any of those archangel republicans who stand nearest the throne. The sad consequences of such temerity are too fresh and green in their memories to warrant the boldest spirit to try the hazardous experiment.

"But yesterday the name of Bristow might have stood against the world," but he dared to lay his hands on the anointed, and "Now lies he there, with none so poor to do him reverence." Jewell, Pratt, Wilson, Yaryan, a noble line of martyrs, lie headless at the feet of the martial Babcock and the jovial Shepherd. Rash men! knew ye not the "true princes? Instinct should have taught ye better."

But some of the more restive spirits of the republican party say this is not republicanism, but Grantism. Ah! but Grantism is the natural-born child of republicanism, its normal development and legitimate offspring. Strike down the safeguards of the Constitution, prostrate the reserved rights of the States and people to the Federal power, and you have for result an irresponsible personal government run in the interest of individuals, rings, and jobs. As a further result you have fealty to the chiefs as the basis of all political preferment, and as a consequence the Government is administered, not as a great public trust, but as a mere personal estate, held and given as private benefit. It would be impossible for me within the limited time I have allotted to me to go into a general enumeration of the sad and deplorable consequences of republicanism as developed into Grantism. I shall confine my remarks to a few of its results upon such of the Southern States as have not escaped from its baleful influences.

One of its immediate and most apparent results is to dwarf and emasculate the State governments, and to render them mere dependencies of the dominant party. Their governors become mere henchmen of the President, mere satraps of the central power, without virility or individuality. What more shameful spectacle can be presented than that of Chamberlain and Kellogg to-day. Ostensibly they are the heads and governors of great Commonwealths, supplied with all the appliances and machinery of legislative, executive, and judicial power necessary to separate existence and self-preservation, while in reality they are the mere puppets of the Administration, carrying on, encouraging, and fostering a deliberate plan to stir up strife and bloodshed. Is a crime committed within their State, they, without seeking or desiring to bring the perpetrator to justice, rush off at break-neck speed to their master at Washington, and crouching at his imperial feet, proceed to whine out their doleful tales. Shame upon such paltroonery for partisan ends. They are actually engaged in a brokerage of crime, and are never so happy as when they can rehearse to their master some fearful tale of blood. They gloat over the slaughter of their poor deluded colored followers, and offer them up with the sublime devotion of an enthusiast upon the altar of political success. To incite, encourage, and stimulate hatred and strife between the white and colored people of their States is their dearest wish and constant occupation. It is the chief stock in trade of their masters; it is the forlorn-hope of the republican party. Eliminate the bloody shirt from the republican campaign, and there is nothing left with which to fire the northern heart, except the party's corruption, rings, and jobs, and business prostration and financial distress at home and national dishonor abroad.

Under the pretense of protecting him against the violence and intimidation of the whites, the republican party through its southern emissaries keep the poor colored man under moral and even physical duress that is little short of moral and political slavery. It claims the negro as its own, body and soul, by divine indefeasible right. He has no right of choice, no election. His ticket is put into his hand by his republican master, and he is expected and required to vote it. His imagination is inflamed and excited by most horrible pictures of the dire purposes of his employer, of the man who feeds and clothes and shelters him; of the man who, when he is sick, attends and ministers to him. His fears are worked upon until the poor negro is finally led to believe that the good man from whose hand he has received so many kindnesses is politically a kind of "goblin damned." If these moral influences fail to impress sufficiently the poor dupe, resort is had to the physical dangers of the "Union League" and "Union Rights Stop." Why, sir, I do not hesitate to assert that there is more coercion, more intimidation practiced upon the negro by the republican party than by all the democrats, White Leagues, and Ku-Klux put together. Hon. Mr. FOSTER, of Ohio, republican chairman of special committee of the last Congress to investigate Louisiana affairs, says that there was no intimidation of the blacks by the whites in the election of November, 1874; but that, on the contrary, it was shown that there was intimidation and coercion by the republican negroes of negroes desiring to vote the democratic ticket.

The military officer lately in command at Port Hudson, Louisiana, charged to investigate the late troubles in that region, reports to his superiors that he found in existence among the negroes there an organization styled the "Union Rights Stop," by the laws and constitution of which the penalty even of death was denounced not only upon apostates, but upon all negroes who refused for the third time to join their organization. Sir, I repeat that by artifice, falsehood, force, and fraud the republican leaders exercise a despotism and coercive power over the negroes of the South that are absolutely appalling. And all this is done under the pretext of protecting the negro from the white man. Sir, what are we to think of a party which for the sake of ascendency will go into peaceful communities and stir up strife and hatred and bloodshed; that will deliberately and at dead of night enter your back doors when you are asleep and there organize and incite your employés and neighbors to the most deadly hatred and fear of you; that seeks to maintain itself by inflaming all the worst passion of an uneducated and impressible race? Sir, to my mind it amounts almost to diabolism. It is that fell spirit which drove Satan to prefer "reigning in hell to serving in heaven." But, sir, it also shows, thank God, the desperate straits to which the party is driven to save itself. The seal of public condemnation is upon it. The handwriting is upon the wall, and it is wildly, madly seeking a place to shelter itself from the storm of indignation that it sees rolling its dark clouds up the horizon. It flies to "southern outrages" as its last and only refuge. The people of this mighty nation has arisen and is sitting in judgment upon its deeds. The poor culprit stands shivering before its judges. In response to every inquiry as to its doing for the past ten years it wildly shouts "Southern outrages." In vain you ask it why it has fostered and fed its pets, its Belknaps, Babcocks, Shepherds, et id omne genus, out of the public Treasury. Its only response is "Southern outrages." When you arraign it for its whisky frauds, its Indian rings, its Navy and railroad jobs, and its wanton squandering of the public moneys, it incoherently but vociferously shouts back "Southern outrages!" This cry is its only stock in trade. Take that from it, and you not only rob it of its last shelter, but you take away its meat and its drink. Whenever an election is to be carried or a fraud to be covered up, then every breeze that sweeps from the South comes laden with the sighs and groans of the dead and dying. The republican leaders proceed "to hang their harps upon the willows," and will not longer "sing the songs of Zion," but wrap themselves in sackcloth and ashes, and proceed to fire the northern heart with an Iliad of woes. Long lines of Ku-Klux, with horns and hoofs and forked tails, are made to parade in solemn procession before the imaginations of their auditors; and one would suppose that suddenly the green fields and undulating hills of the South were emitting the sulphurous fumes of perdition and that her people, suddenly transformed into demons, were holding a saturnalia of blood. Thank God, too, that they have flaunted the bloody shirt until it has got so threadbare and so thin that everybody can see through it.

To one born and reared and living always in the South, as I have been, intimately familiar with white and black races there, and knowing, as I do, the feelings and sentiments of the whites toward the blacks, it seems almost incredible, it is absolutely astounding, to hear the horrible stories that are current here and unheard-of there. Sir, I stand here to-day and represent the largest and most populous colored district in the State of Louisiana; and here in my place I assert, without fear of contradiction, that the only intimidation ever practiced in the fourteen parishes composing that district by white men for election purposes was in the fall of 1874, when United States troops, under charge of Marshal Packard's deputies, who were armed with quires of warrants issued in blank by United States commissioners, rode and raided over the parishes of Union, Claiborne, Jackson, and Lincoln, arresting, handcuffing, and dragging from their homes and families at dead of night their best and most peaceful citizens, without the shadow of an affidavit or charge against them, except such charge as Deputy Marshal Edgar Selye saw fit to fill into his blank and, as he swears, forged warrants.

Sir, I appeal to you and to all honorable men of whatever party to take this home to yourselves. Let Mr. Grant, under the lead of wicked, vindictive men like Packard, bent upon your humiliation and degradation, turn his troopers loose upon you. Let them raid at night through your rural districts, without warrant and without law, dragging your oldest and best citizens from their beds, handcuffing them, and spiriting them away from home and friends! Sir, what would the people of Ohio say to that? Would not there go up from your midst a thunder-burst of indignation that would shake the continent? Ah! but have you not the manhood to sympathise with the poor, plundered people of the South who have suffered and will suffer again all this, for no crime except that they will not vote the republican ticket? Will you longer heed the misrepresentations and slanders of the southern people by the bad men who through you hope to continue their lease of power and plunder in the South? From now till the election they will fill the air with their cries of "blood," "murder," and "outrage." Will you believe them? Let us reason together. Let us look at the facts.

Why is there peace between the races in Virginia, and Tennessee, and Kentucky, and Missouri, and Arkansas, and Georgia, and Alabama? There the colored man is peaceful, and in the full enjoyment of all his rights; and yet he is living with the same rebels and traitors, (as we are fondly called.) I will tell you why. Because the bad men who make their living by stirring up strife between the races have there lost their influence with the colored man; because the colored man has found by actual experience the falsehoods and deceptions practiced upon him; because his mind has been disabused of the idea so sedulously inculcated in him that we want to re-enslave him or deprive him of his rights. And this, too, is the reason why Alabama in her late election rolls up a majority of 40,000 for Governor Houston. It is not because the black man has been intimidated, as Mr. Senator SPENCER is pleased to suggest; but is because he is freed and emancipated from that hideous dread and fear which have oppressed him for years, and because he has exercised his rights like a freeman, for his own good. Why is it not just as rational and natural that I, who employ and feed, clothe and shelter these people should exercise a controlling influence over them in politics, and that they should trust me in that as they do in all other of the concerns of life, as it is that your operatives should be influenced and controlled by their employers? As a general rule, is not the employer the more intelligent and is there not generally an identity of political interest between them? Will not legislation and administration which enhance the benefits of the employer generally advantage the employé?

Sir, if left alone to ourselves, to the operation of natural laws and normal conditions, there is and can be no antagonism between the races in the South. Why not then for once give non-intervention a fair trial; especially as the efforts of constant interference by the Federal Government have proved so unavailing; and especially as, in those States where Federal interference has ceased, peace and order and good feeling prevail, and the colored man has the full measure of his rights?

Ah, sir, I will tell you why the strife must go on. The republican party cannot afford to have peace in the South; it does not intend that there shall be peace there. Already the notes of preparation can be heard; already Marshal Packard is marshaling the military to secure his own elevation as governor of Louisiana. He is longing for blood, and carnage, and outrage. The heartless declaration of Ex-Governor Ames that the blood of twenty or thirty colored men would be of service to the republican party meets an enthusiastic response in the loyal bosoms of Kellogg, and Chamberlain, and Packard. These desperate men are expected and required to manufacture and get up ammunition for the northern campaign. Without that staple production of carpet-bag governments, "southern outrages," the republican party is flat broke; its sinews of war are gone, for it cannot look an honest constituency in the face and say that it has faithfully administered the great public trust committed to it.

Sir, since the close of the war the whole policy and practice of the republican party toward the people of the South has been ungenerous. Why? Simply because that people have, in the exercise of the undoubted right of every free American citizen, differed with it politically. This is the only crime of which we have been guilty. This is manifest from the course of that party toward men of the South like Longstreet, Holden, and others who have washed away the sins of rebellion by a profession of faith in the redeeming powers of the republican party. Though a southern man's sins "be as scarlet," join the republican party, and they shall be made "white as snow." Every sin, every shortcoming is washed away by republican baptism; but woe to the poor wretch who does not receive republican absolution. Better he had never been born! For he is only

> Fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils:
> The motions of his soul are dull as night,
> And his affections dark as Erebus:
> Let no such man be trusted!

Sir, the people of the South want peace. They want reconciliation with their northern brothers. They love the Constitution and revere its memories. They believe before God that the democratic party truly represents the spirit and intent of that great charter of liberty. They believe that the republican party does not; that it tends to centralization and to the destruction of fundamental principles. They believe that the bad governments of the South are the normal developments of that personal government which has grown up under the republican party. This is why we vote the democratic ticket. We do it from conviction and a high sense of duty, not from any animosity or hostility to the men who compose the republican party. I here state that many of my warmest and dearest personal friends in the South are republicans, white men who have come there since the war to cast their lot with us; men who are as ardent and doubtless as honest in their political convictions as I am. I stand here as the Representative of many of them, and I am proud to say, too, as the Representative and choice of at least four thousand colored voters of my district. If I were conscious of harboring in my heart any wish, any desire, to do them wrong, to deprive them of a single constitutional, legal, or civil right, I would pray God to palsy the arm I raised to strike them.

Sir, leave the people of those States where you leave the people of the other States, to settle their own home affairs. Withdraw your troops, and call back the emissaries who are among us inciting the colored man to hatred of his white neighbor. Leave the negro free to vote with the whites if he wishes, and, sir, you will have laid the foundations of permanent peace and prosperity for the unhappy South, and you will have placed the rights and liberties of the colored man upon the only safe and firm basis on which they can rest—the good-will, the self-interest of the dominant race.

Reduction of Expenditures.

SPEECH OF WILLIAM R. MORRISON,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 10, 1876,

On reduction of the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, the report just made, and others to be made which have been substantially agreed upon, ends for the session our efforts to reduce expenditures, so well begun and so faithfully adhered to by the chairman [Mr. RANDALL] and his associates of the Committee on Appropriations. The result is a reduction of $29,944,252 below appropriations of last year and $55,380,650 below the estimates and amounts asked for by the Departments. (1.) This annual saving continued from year to year, and placed at the highest rate of interest now paid by the Government, will pay off the principal of its whole interest-bearing debt in twenty-five years. This admonishes us of the necessity for the strictest economy and frugality in the administration of the Government.

Economy is but another name for honesty in public affairs, while extravagance in civil administration means neither more nor less than dishonesty, and as surely leads to debauchery and corruption. Money taken from the public and given to those who have not earned it is taken no less wrongfully with than without the forms of law. "Hard times" have overtaken us. Money will buy more labor and more of the products of labor now than during the war and many years thereafter. This has been recognized and conformed to in all private business avocations and employments by the reduction of the wages of labor and the prices of its products. We have insisted and do insist upon recognizing the fact in public employments. Since the profits and earnings of those who pay the taxes have fallen off we have insisted and do insist there shall be some reduction in the earnings of those who live from and consume them.

The appropriation bills passed and agreed upon result in the discharge of seven hundred and sixty-five persons now needlessly kept in the pay of the Government, and an annual saving, as already stated, of nearly thirty millions. Hereafter it is believed the one test as to the true amount of appropriations will be the just and economic needs of the public service. These reductions will be permanent and will be followed by others which can be made whenever we can have the co-operation of the other branches and Departments of the Government. The reductions made are of course but for a single year, but it will be long before any House of Representatives assembles here reckless enough to increase them. Such increase can only be secured by returning here a majority of our political opponents who have so earnestly resisted these reductions.

The return of such a majority sends us back to our seats at the next session beaten, rebuked, and virtually instructed to undo our work; instructed to restore appropriations and expenditures to the scale from which we have reduced them; and instructed to join those who have resisted us in their discharge in calling back the seven hundred and sixty-five useless employés to be maintained at the public expense.

In justification of the rate of expenditure and retention upon the pay-rolls of employés unnecessary to the public service it is asserted here and elsewhere that under the present Administration there has been an average annual reduction in the ordinary Government expenditures of $10,000,000. The assertion is incorrect and untrue. The ordinary yearly expenditure, not including interest on the public debt and pensions, was at the commencement of President Grant's administration $160,146,354. That was the amount of expenditure for the year ending June 30, 1869, which included the last eight months of President Johnson's and the first four months of President Grant's administration. An inquiry as to the amounts of annual expenditure will show a reduction and saving in the first years of President Grant's first term, so that the annual cost of administration had fallen from one hundred and sixty millions in 1869 to one hundred and twenty-four millions in 1872. Once safely tided over the election of 1872 by the promise of an honest, frugal, and economical administration which the reduction of 1869 to 1872 gave the people, this party of promises never kept re-established its former high rate of expenditure; and the yearly rate, which had fallen from $160,000,000 in 1869 to $124,000,000 in 1872, went up to $165,000,000 in 1874, or five millions above the rate at the commencement of President Grant's first term. This breach of faith on the part of our political opponents was rebuked by the election of this House of Representatives, and at once, in the last session of last Congress, they began to reduce expenditures which at the end of last year were still six millions above the expenditures of five years ago. The average annual expenditure during the first seven years of this Administration, ending with June last, was $138,876,033, or $21,270,321 below the rate at its inauguration; an annual reduction of $3,038,617—not $9,000,000 as so often asserted here and elsewhere.

Another mode by which those who are compelled to defend and justify wasteful expenditure is to charge as the result of the war what is in fact the result of bad administration. However much the expenditures are in excess of the demands of a just economy, that much they charge to the war. Voluminous tables are introduced here and sent to the country and called "official data;" they are so called, I suppose, because prepared by a Treasury official; but it must be remembered that besides being a Treasury official the gentleman who prepared these tables is also a republican politician, and that in this latter character he prepared the tables. It is attempted to be shown by the tables so prepared that the ordinary expenditure of the Government was actually less to the person in 1875 than in 1860 and 1861.

In his speech made here February 24, 1875, (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD volume 2, page 1703) the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who never credits less to his party than belongs to it, said:

> The interest on the public debt, the pensions, the back pay and bounties of volunteers, and all that goes to make up the expenses which the war made necessary, even yet make nearly 54 per cent. of the total expenses of the Government.

As we get away from the war the expenditures growing out of it fall off, and a careful analysis of the expenditures for the year 1875 will show that items so chargeable amount to 44 per cent. of the whole expenditure, which would reduce the ordinary expenditure for that year to $144,000,000; but admitting all that was claimed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] nearly 4 per cent. for expenditure growing out of the war and the ordinary expenditure for that year, none of it chargeable to that account, still amount to the sum of $126,326,760. This is about $5,000,000 more than double as much as in 1861, and unless "official data" can be obtained from which it will appear that our forty-four millions of people in 1875 are double as many as thirty-one millions in 1860 the assertion that our expenditures in 1875 were less to the person than in 1860-'61, or less than 45 per cent. more to the person than in 1860-'61, must go the way of all untruth. I append the table from which so many "official data" are extracted, showing how much more economical is the expenditure of $274,000,000 in 1875 than $61,000,000 in 1860. (3.) From these tables of "official data" it will appear that its author charges to the war and credits his party not only with amounts paid on account of the public debt, pensions, bounties, internal revenue, and items of expenditure rightfully so chargeable, but with $300,000 more for reporting and printing debates and other printing for Congress; with two millions and more for salaries in Treasury, War, and Navy Departments; with $1,400,000 for one-third of whole judiciary system; with $1,000,000 and more for postage in lieu of the franking privilege; with $1,400,000 and more for money expended and wasted in this District; with $12,400,000 and more spent on rivers, harbors, and public buildings, and with $4,600,000 and more difference in cost of collecting customs now and in 1860; with $13,600,000 and more for the difference in the cost of the Army now and in 1860; with $4,000,000 for constructing four new vessels in 1875. What had the war to do with these items of expenditure, and what must be thought of a cause which requires a resort to such means for its support?

One of my colleagues, [Mr. HURLBUT,] zealous to free his party from the charges of corruption which now overwhelm it, assisted by some tables prepared at the same place, probably by the same hand as were those to which I have just referred, has ascertained, he says, "that the nearer you come to this actual time in which we live, to this present existing much-abused administration of President Grant, the standard of honor and fidelity, as measured by the official reports becomes higher and finer." He assumes that these tables show that of the money (loans, bonds, &c., included) which came into and went out of the Treasury "the very lowest rate of losses ever reached, is in this present presidential term." When he presents the tables which shall tell us the "rate of losses" at Saint Louis, Chicago, Milwaukee, New Orleans, New York, and elsewhere, of revenues which could not be taken out, never having been in the Treasury, we may be able to judge of the correctness of his estimate "of the standard of honor and fidelity" of "this actual time in which we live." Alike insincere with other pretenses to lead public attention away from past official misdeeds are the pretenses of dangers to be apprehended from the allowance of southern cotton and other claims.

These receive their first consideration in the Committee on War Claims of which my colleague [Mr. EDEN] is chairman.

Let us see what was said of these claims when the subject was under consideration here:

> Mr. EDEN. I yield a few minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]
> Mr. CONGER. I have but one or two words to say upon this subject. * * * I am pleased to bear testimony before this House to the strictness, accuracy, and care with which every claim is examined by the Committee on War Claims, so as to bring it within the rules which I and every other gentleman of that committee require; those rules which should apply to the whole class of war claims, either in the loyal States or in the Southern States——
> Mr. MILLIKEN. And the rules prescribed by law.
> Mr. CONGER. And the rules prescribed by law. I take pleasure in saying here, for the committee with which I have the honor to act, that so far as I have seen there has been on the part of every member of that committee unusual care and strictness in the examination of every one of these claims. Not only have members insisted upon the observance of those rules of law which we are all bound to regard, but they have conformed to the strictest rules which I, claiming to be an extreme man in reference to the allowance of southern claims, would regard as proper. I think it due to myself as a member on this side of the House to say in answer to my friend from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] that I am satisfied the Committee on War Claims do not intend to permit any of the thousands—I do not know but I might almost say millions—of claims which have been and will be presented before that committee in this and succeeding Congresses to be reported to this House until they are brought strictly within the requirements of law. I feel satisfied that the most rigid rule must be complied with before they can be reported here.

Certainly when so ultra a partisan as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] bears such testimony no danger need be apprehended from the unjust allowance of any claims. Their presentation at this session is not unusual or different from other sessions, and cannot be prevented until the right of petition is denied.

Will some gentleman upon the other side of the House tell us what objectionable claims we have passed? If they cannot do this they are justly censurable for pretending a fear of that which does not exist. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has felt it incumbent upon him to warn the country of the dangers to be apprehended from southern men and their return here, yet he and his party claim that they are here by their grace and permission.

This would seem to be no new fear with him, but assumes now only a new form. He sees them obtaining undue power in the House through the action of the Speaker in the organization.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] spoiled this little piece of shamming by showing that only upon one of the standing committees is there a majority of southern men—that of Education and Labor. And to make that majority he counts as a southern man its excellent chairman, [Mr. WALKER, of Virginia,] himself a northern man and Union soldier. He [Mr. HALE] complains because, as he alleges, "The journal clerk went out under the system followed here." Mr. Barclay, the journal clerk, he then admits, "went out" (resigned) because he could not dictate to the House the retention of "certain gentlemen" with whom he was intimately associated. There was an assistant journal clerk at a salary of $3,000, an office since dispensed with. The retention of Mr. Barclay, however intelligent and useful, at $3,600 per annum, with an assistant at $3,000 per annum, was still in some sense the retention of a pensioner who never bore arms. Their joint labors are now performed not less faithfully and efficiently for $2,500 by Henry H. Smith, long an employé of the House when under republican control. He was a Union soldier in the Twenty-sixth Michigan Infantry and wounded in the service. We are satisfied, doubtless the country is satisfied, though the gentleman from Maine with all his sympathy for the soldier refuses to be comforted, because Barclay and assistant "went out" and Smith went in. Further commenting on appointments made in the organization of the House, Mr. HALE said:

> Here and there individual cases attract attention and deserve mention, both as showing removals without cause and also showing the very superior order of merit introduced by the party just taking possession of the House. * * * I notice them because of the claim that bad men are to be put out of office and good men put in. * * * The clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means was the now rather notorious James P. Hambleton. The place is very important. The clerk possesses all the secrets of this most important committee, secrets sometimes worth hundreds of thousands of dollars to desperate men interested upon the subjects considered in the committee, which revises and re-arranges our tariff laws and all revenue laws at its pleasure.

Mr. Speaker, when I was made chairman of the Ways and Means Committee the then clerk had long acted as such by appointment of our republican friends, who have for many years controlled the organization of the House, and all that time he was in possession of its secrets, "sometimes," the gentleman from Maine tells us, "worth hundreds of thousands of dollars;" and it will be remembered, too, that it was charged that he had sold the secrets of the committee. During the Forty-second Congress it was proven by at least one witness, Mr. Colgate, of New York, that this clerk had demanded money for the secrets of the committee, or for services which he (the clerk) had rendered in the removal of brokers' taxes by a bill reported from that committee. It will be remembered, too, that evidence of a demand for money, in connection with the removal of this same tax, drove a republican United States judge from the bench, but it does not seem to have been sufficient to drive this clerk from his position. Yet I thought him an improper person for so important a trust and displaced him. In his place I appointed Dr. Hambleton upon the recommendation of gentlemen upon whom I might well rely, chiefly upon the recommendation and at the personal request of Speaker

KERR, and so informed the committee at the time. When, afterward, I ascertained his appointment was an objectionable one I displaced him as I had displaced the former clerk. Another small piece of hypocrisy is much practiced here by those who are continually bewailing the removal of "Union soldiers." Every man of the disabled soldiers' roll who has not died or voluntarily given up his place is still here in the employ of the House. Those who were here during former Congresses, and are not now here, were elective officers and their appointees, and all republican politicians. Some have been replaced with other Union soldiers and some with soldiers of the army against whom they fought. If men who bore arms against the Government are allowed, as they have been by the gentleman from Maine and his party, (by their grace, they sometimes claim,) to enter this Hall as members it is difficult to see what greater injury can befall the country if a few of the men who did no more are allowed to open the doors.

And there is the ex-Doorkeeper, Fitzhugh. What of him? He wrote a foolish letter, showing him to be unfitted for an important trust, and we displaced him too. Now let us inquire who it was that he displaced.

It will be recollected that at the last Congress it was proven before the Ways and Means Committee and reported to the House that nearly a million of dollars had been corruptly expended in securing the mail-steamship subsidy through a law enacted by Congress; that $4,500 of this went into the hands of the assistant doorkeeper of the republican House and a greater sum to another employé. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] presented the report of the committee to the House, containing among other things the following:

The committee do not recommend further action in the case of the two employés of this House who, after the passage of this act, received rewards, as shown in their evidence, being informed that both of them have resigned.

Both of them who had shared in the corruption fund we were told by this report had resigned. The assistant doorkeeper disappeared at once from his desk at the door, but there was a place from which he did not disappear until the meeting of this House, that was the pay-rolls of the officers of the House.

Here we see our republican friends, who have so much to say of clerks and doorkeepers, assuring the House and the country of the unfitness and displacement of this man and yet retaining him on the pay-rolls at a cost of $2,000 until displaced by us of the majority nine months afterward, he rendering no services in the mean time. Will it be said that this was done by the Doorkeeper, who retained his assistant, and that our friends over the way who talk so much of the appointment of improper persons by us are not responsible for it? Why, gentlemen, you indorsed and approved it. Every man of you, including your amiable candidate for Vice-President, who presented his name as a candidate, favored the re-election of and voted for the Doorkeeper at the commencement of this session; thus indorsing and approving his retention of the corrupt assistant.

Mr. Speaker, I find no pleasure in calling attention to these bad and inexcusable acts of the minority here; but the injustice and insincerity of their criticisms of the organization of the House and of our acts and purposes generally have impelled me to say so much in explanation and justification of changes made in the organization of the House. We made some mistakes in our appointments and we speedily corrected them. It were well for the country if our republican friends could truthfully say as much.

In the matter of appropriations only could we hope to reform abuses by legislation, for only this legislation could not be postponed by the Senate. How well and faithfully have we insisted on conditions of frugality is already known. Besides this we could only expose abuses which have crept into every branch of the public service—the people must furnish the remedy for these abuses. And here again we have failed to receive the co-operation of our political opponents, who still insist through my colleague [Mr. HURLBUT] that "in all this one single and most melancholy case of official misdoing has been undeniably made known." Let us see how they have lain across our path. When we were preparing to present that case with some consideration Mr. Blaine, with that audacity of pretension which belongs only to himself, interposed and said:

Give the case to this side of the House and we will do both very quick; we will indict him and impeach him both.

* * * * * * *

Are the Committee on the Judiciary ready to report? * * * They have had five days to report and have not reported. * * *

I say that up to this time there has been no report from the Committee on the Judiciary, giving all possible immunity to witnesses, either in general or to Marsh by name. There has been nothing initiated on that side; nothing proposed that indicates any desire or honest purpose to do that thing.

Mr. Speaker, it is now five months since we passed a bill "giving all possible immunity to witnesses" whose presence here would add many more to "this one single and most melancholy case of official misdoing." Five months ago that bill went to the Senate. Has anybody heard of it since? We did impeach him of the one solitary case, but with what result? Not guilty. Not guilty of what? Of the charge of corruption made against him? No, that was proven and confessed. Not guilty of being in office, say his judges; but he was in office when the guilt was made known. How came he out? Who let this "guilty man escape?" So ends the one case of "official misdoing" undeniably made known.

Why was this case undeniably made known by the admission of his party friends? It was because of his own admissions and only because of these. Had he denied his "official misdoing" it would have been as strenuously denied and by the same men who deny the hundreds of other cases of "official misdoing" affecting nearly every branch of the public service, as well proved as that of Belknap was proved, had he but interposed his denial.

And just here, Mr. Speaker, is the sum of our offending. We have exposed "official misdoings," receiving instead of co-operation only abuse from the minority. When this democratic House sent the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] first and ablest among the republican members, to impeach Belknap at the bar of the Senate, he there asked that it should be done, because, said he:

I have heard the taunt from friendliest lips that when the United States presented herself in the East to take part with the civilized world in generous competition in the arts of life the only product of her institutions in which she surpassed all others beyond question was her corruption.

Mr. Speaker, this is no new declaration of the shameful fact, nor are the exposures made by us of official misdeeds at all new. The press of the country and men like Trumbull, Sumner, and Schurz proclaimed their existence and the existence of other like abuses in 1872. The Credit Mobilier frauds were denied then as all the recently exposed official peculations not confessed by the offenders are now denied. Many of those who exposed "official misdoing" in 1872 were expelled from office, and all of them from their party. This House of Representatives, because it has exposed "official misdoings," is called by those who apologize for and would conceal fraud "confederate," that the recollections of the past may impel the North to send the majority here into that political exile where Bristow and Wilson and Pratt and every man who has dared to expose official fraud or approve their exposure has already gone.

May I ask when and how is this corruption with which friendliest lips have taunted us, as stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] and in which we surpass all other nations, to end or be ended? Will it be done by expelling from places of power and influence all those who expose and would punish it? Will it be done by a change of any one man for another—by a change from Grant to Hayes? Who of their partisans has said or will say here that the former is less honest or less able than the latter? Not one. We must have a change, not of a man, but of men, resulting in a change of system.

Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

SPEECH OF HON. W. B. WILLIAMS,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 14, 1876,

On the operations of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department and of the subcommittee to whom the subject of the expenditures in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was referred, acting in connection with the chairman of such committee, I have been very much surprised at a speech of the chairman of such committee printed in the RECORD of the 8th instant, purporting to have been made on the 29th of July, the House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for debate only. I am surprised because I had formed a very high estimate of the candor of the gentleman and of his impartiality, while the speech shows a bias in favor of certain private corporations and perhaps a prejudice against the Bureau of Engraving and Printing which cannot be accounted for by any evidence taken before the committee or by any representations made to it from the Department; in fact the gentleman in his speech practically ignores the evidence taken before the committee and very largely the reports made to the committee by the Treasury Department of the proceedings in and management of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. For the purpose of correcting the many errors, inconsistencies, and shortcomings in the speech of the gentleman from New York, I deem it my duty as a member of the committee to present the questions submitted by him in the light in which they have appeared to me by the evidence taken before the committee and by the reports of former committees to which he has referred, and by replies to queries from this committee by the Department.

The propriety of the maintenance of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing by the Government has been frequently questioned, and a number of investigations have been made at the instigation of interests which perhaps had something to do with the speech which the gentleman from New York has made. The Bureau of Engraving and Printing is engaged in an occupation which brings it more or less in antagonism with certain private corporations, three of which are in the city of New York, and with a combined capital of $5,000,000. At the time of the organization of this Bureau there were but two corporations or companies in the country able to do and engaged in the work of preparing and manufacturing the Government issues and securities, namely, the American and National Bank-Note Companies of New York. The exigencies of the war demanded an immediate issue of a large amount of currency to replace the coin withdrawn from circulation, and in this emergency the Government found itself at the mercy of these corporations and compelled to submit to their exactions, as they held a perfect and well-organized monopoly of the facilities for doing this work; they were powerful corporations, acting in all respects with remarkable unanimity, and the establishment of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in the Treasury Department has been met from the outset by a continuous antagonism on the part of these corporations for the reason, I apprehend, that it interfered with their monopoly, that it reduced their exorbitant rates, and injured their business to a large extent; and this opposition has been based upon their financial interests, and not upon the interests of the Government or of the people.

These corporations have always found representatives on this floor to look after their interests and bring their demands before committees investigating the Bureau of Engraving and Printing upon many and different classes of charges; some affecting the morality of the institution, others affecting its economy, and others affecting its honesty.

At this session of Congress no charges have been preferred against the Bureau of Engraving and Printing by any member of Congress, nor has the subject been brought up in any formal manner for our investigation; no resolution has been referred to the committee requiring the investigation by it of the relative merits of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the bank-note companies; but it was evident immediately after the organization of the committee that an effort was to be made in that direction. The attorney of the companies persisted in his efforts, as he has for years past, to bring about a change in the system of printing the Government securities, and propounded a series of inquiries which were received by the committee and submitted to the Treasury Department, to which replies were made. Not being satisfied with these replies, he propounded a second and additional series of inquiries, which were in a similar manner received by the committee and submitted to the Department; all of which are found in Miscellaneous Document No. 163, parts 1 and 2, of the Forty-fourth Congress. These inquiries, let it be distinctly understood, were not in any sense the inquiries of the committee or of Congress, for no resolution looking to any such action had been submitted to the committee by the House; but they were literally the questions propounded by the paid attorney of these corporations to the Government of the United States, and they received the official sanction of the committee. And thus the Government has been compelled by this official sanction, not only of this but of prior committees, to open up and expose its operation to competing corporations seeking to get the business so exposed from the control of the Government in order that they themselves may be enriched and benefited thereby! It is the old fight of Corporations versus The People, and in this instance a branch of the Government is struck at in which the people have deeper interests than perhaps any other which comes before Congress for consideration; that is, the protection of the currency of the country, that the people may be secured from loss by unauthorized over-issues and the circulation of counterfeits and imitations.

THE WORKINGS OF THE BUREAU.

The gentleman starts out with a proposition somewhat sweeping in reference to a "manufacturing establishment carried on by the Government in the city of Washington, employing from fifteen hundred to two thousand persons, with a monthly pay-roll running from $100,000 to $150,000, with apparatus and machinery upon which there has been expended between six and seven hundred thousand dollars." This statement is not correct in regard to the pay-rolls of the "establishment." Whether it is in regard to the cost of its machinery I am not prepared to state. To illustrate: The appropriations made for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1876, for labor, &c., in the Bureau, provides an average monthly payment of $91,581.81, distributed over the entire year, as will be seen by the following statement:

Total amounts appropriated for labor, &c., for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1876:

Office of Bureau	$30,509 50
Labor and expenses	1,125,000 00
National currency	200,000 00
Deficiency	163,000 00
Deficiency for national currency	48,000 00
Total	1,566,509 50
Of this amount there was paid to the bank-note companies	467,527 77
Leaving a balance of	1,098,981 73

which, distributed over one year, averages a monthly payment of $91,581.81.

I call attention to this for the purpose of showing a sample of the errors of fact running all through the speech of the gentleman from New York, in which he acknowledges and admits everything that would make against the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, while he has belittled everything that came in his path that would make for it, in the same or greater proportion than is here illustrated; for, instead of a pay-roll running from $100,000 to $150,000 per month the appropriation will only permit an average of about $91,000 per month; and this year, and during the last fiscal year, the appropriations and expenses were larger than in former years in consequence of the Bureau having to print the faces and finish the national-bank currency, work which was before done by the bank-note companies; this was of course so much loss to these corporations, and it serves to renew their zeal in endeavoring to overturn and destroy the Bureau, and perhaps is the milk in the cocoanut that induced and prompted the speech of the gentleman from New York. We find him saying in the same paragraph:

This business is not carried on by the Government, because it can do the work with greater security and economy than private parties; for the American Bank-Note Company supplied the Government long before this factory was started, and for nearly fifty years printed the securities ready for issue, and furnishes them now to several governments in Europe and to almost all those in South America.

This American Bank-Note Company to which he refers is one of his most powerful constituents, and we will find on investigation that this company has been obliged since the fifty years in which he claims that they furnished securities ready for issue for this Government and others to reduce its rates very much in consequence of the competition which this Bureau of Engraving and Printing has furnished in doing the Government work; and I claim as a matter of fact that the Bureau has saved to the Government a large percentage of its entire cost by the reduction in cost of the manufacture and production of the Government issues during the time it has been in operation. This is clearly demonstrated in the reduction of the rates paid these companies prior to and since its formation, as will appear by the following table:

The issue of United States notes, series of 1869, size 8¼ by 13½ inches, 4 subjects, was commenced in October, 1869, the tints and backs of the denominations from $1 to $10, and the backs only of the denominations from $20 to $1,000, being printed by the New York bank-note companies, divided as follows, namely:

The American Bank-Note Company:
For engraving, retouching, and printing:
The tints (on the face of the notes) of the $1 and $10, at $22 per one thousand impressions.
The backs of the $2 and $5, at $25 per one thousand impressions.
The backs of the $20, $50, $100, $500, and $1,000, at $22 per one thousand impressions.

The National Bank-Note Company:
For engraving, retouching, and printing:
The tints of the $2 and $5, at $22 per one thousand impressions.
The backs of the $1 and $10, at $25 per one thousand impressions.

PRICES IN 1870.

In July, 1870, the rates for engraving, retouching, and printing the above work were reduced as follows, namely:

Tints on $1 and $10, from $22 to $20 per one thousand impressions.
Backs on $2 and $5, from $25 to $23 per one thousand impressions.
Tints on $2 and $5, from $22 to $20 per one thousand impressions.

Backs on $20, $50, $100, $500, $1,000, from $22 to $20 per one thousand impressions.

The Bureau of Engraving and Printing became a necessity during the late war, not only in order that the work of preparing Government securities should be in the hands of those who were interested in maintaining the Government itself, and who were not willing to print the obligations of the confederacy as well as those of the Federal Government, but that the issues so made should be authentic and genuine. It was a favorite measure of Secretary Chase, who was then in charge of the Treasury Department, and its working has proved the correctness of his views in regard to it. It was his desire to have the entire work performed in the Bureau, but its inability at that time to do the work, the result in part of the long dependence on the bank-note companies, compelled him to adopt a different course than he was authorized to do by the act of June 11, 1862, and to divide the work between the companies and the Bureau. Secretary Chase's views have been fully approved by every one of his successors, and the question practically is whether those more deeply interested in and connected with the Government in its operations, and whom we believe to be honest and above reproach, will be better able to judge of the interests of the Government than those who represent private corporations and interests that lie in a contrary direction, namely, the financial success of such corporations.

But it is not necessary to rely upon their judgment; the actual working here presented shows that it has been a financial success, and that theory and practice meet in the scheme for the benefit of the people and the Government; for the benefit of every bill-holder in the United States; for the benefit of every one who holds a fractional-currency note to the amount of a ten-cent piece! It is but a few years ago that after the issue of the postal currency the country was flooded with counterfeit and spurious issues of the twenty-five-cent and fifty-cent notes, and it is rare now to find one. What has brought about this change? Has it been the bank-note companies, who at that time had the sole printing of this currency, or has it been the system in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving devised to protect the people?

But the gentleman says:

This factory is for the manufacture of fractional currency, United States notes, bonds, stamps, and other securities of the United States, and is the largest engraving and printing establishment in the world.

Why should not the Government manufacture the fractional-currency notes, bonds, and stamps, and other securities which it may issue?

The report to which the gentleman refers so frequently (report No. 150, Forty-third Congress) lays down the proposition that the Government should not engage in any work that can be safely and properly done by private enterprise. It is true the Government ought not to engage in any work that can safely and properly be done by private enterprise at fair and legitimate rates, but here is precisely the question at issue; should the Government tear down its mints and divide the work of coining its bullion among private corporations? If it should not delegate the work of preparing its coined money to private enterprises, why should it delegate the work of preparing its paper obligations? They both stand on the same level; the one is no more sacred than the other, and the Government has from the days of Alexander Hamilton, in 1792, down to the present time, controlled absolutely and exclusively the work of coining the money of the nation. No person would stand on this floor and advocate a proposition to transfer the coinage of money to private hands; the people would look upon it as a dangerous innovation, as tending to prejudice and destroy confidence in the coined money of the country. And why should any different system be adopted in the preparation of the paper money of the nation? Is not the same security necessary in the latter that is necessary to protect the Government from the issue of bogus and spurious coin? Why not protect the issue of both by the same limitations?

ATTACKS UPON THE BUREAU.

There would, I apprehend, be no question about it were it not for the fact that these private competing corporations find their financial interests interfered with by this Bureau, and therefore they seek to overthrow it; there can always be found some person subservient to their interests who will endeavor to carry out their projects, and with the aid of their paid attorneys endeavor through the committees of Congress to accomplish their ends; and thus we see in the Forty-third Congress the subject was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, where the corporations evidently felt that their interests would be looked out for, while at this session it has been taken up without reference by the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

It would seem that if the interests of the people were being impaired or affected in any manner to their injury by the action of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, some demand would be made by them for a change. But I am not aware of any petition on the part of the people; any clamor anywhere on the part of those most deeply interested in the most secure system that can be adopted in the preparation of the Government issues in favor of any change from the Bureau; but I do find efforts constantly made by these corporations to procure it.

The first organized attack was made in the Thirty-eighth Congress and originated in a speech of the late Hon. James Brooks, of New York City, in which he made charges criminatory of the chief of the Bureau, Mr. Spencer M. Clark; on this an investigation was demanded by the friends of the Bureau, which was ordered by the House. A select committee, with full and complete powers of inquiry, was organized on the 30th April, 1864, and reported on the 30th of June following, after an exhaustive investigation, being Report No. 140, first session, Fortieth Congress. Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio, was chairman of the committee, and their conclusions they summed up as follows:

Reviewing the whole case, the committee are fully persuaded that these charges were in part the result of an effort on the part of some to break up the plan of printing in the Treasury Department, and partly the result of a conspiracy on the part of Colonel Baker and the female prostitutes associated with him, by the aid of coerced testimony, to destroy the reputation of Mr. Clark, and by the odium thus raised against the Treasury Department shield himself and justify his unauthorized arrest of one of the officers in the Printing Bureau. * * * The committee therefore report that the charge made by Hon. James Brooks that the Treasury of the United States had been converted into a house of orgies and bacchanals is wholly unwarranted by the facts, in the highest degree unjust and injurious both to the superintendent and employés in the Printing Bureau of the Treasury; that the other charge that millions and millions of the public money had been sacrificed and still more were in danger of being sacrificed by the system of printing public money now in use in the Treasury Department is not only unwarranted by the facts, but no evidence has been adduced to show that a single dollar has been fraudulently issued under the system of printing now in use. On the contrary, the plan of doing the work in the Treasury Department has facilitated the issue of the currency and very greatly reduced the cost of manufacture.

Next in order was the action taken by Congress in March, 1867, whereby a subcommittee of the Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment and Reform were charged to make thorough inquiries into the official conduct of those charged with the printing, registration, and issue of notes, bonds, and other securities of the Government. The report of the subcommittee in charge of the inquiry was made by Hon. Mr. EDMUNDS, of Vermont, on the 3d of March, 1869, after a prolonged investigation, from which they arrived at the following conclusions:

All these circumstances have satisfied the committee that methods of printing, numbering, sealing, and issuing of the securities of the United States ought to be adopted which will approach the nearest to being absolutely secure against any error and fraud, even if such methods shall be more expensive than others having less guarantees of protection. And it is obvious to the committee that the highest safety is to be obtained by so conducting the work that no one or even two departments should have it in their power to finish any note, bond, or coupon; but that one part of the engraving on the securities should be printed by one establishment and a succeeding part by another entirely distinct and separate from the first, and that the final process of sealing and signing should be done by still another distinct and separate department and in the Treasury. By such methods, each under separate and distinct contract, the nearest approach possible to security will be realized. And as all these securities require two or three distinct processes of engraving and printing, and may have a distinct process of sealing and signing, there is no practical difficulty whatever in adopting such a course.

Another attack was made upon the Bureau at the first session of the Forty-third Congress by the bank-note companies of New York City by a printed memorial addressed to the Committee on Banking and Currency and signed by these companies, arraigning the Bureau upon general charges, among others that the plan of the retrenchment committee reported in 1869 by Mr. EDMUNDS had been ignored and violated by the chief of the Bureau, and that a change of system was required whereby contracts should be made with the bank-note companies. A thorough investigation of these charges was made and resulted in a majority and minority report. The majority report was submitted by Mr. PHELPS, of the committee, (report No. 150, second session Forty-third Congress,) whose conclusion, signed by five of the committee, was as follows:

1. That all the national-bank notes, United States notes, and other securities of the United States, except the fractional currency, be executed with at least three plate-printings, besides the seal-printing; and that at least two of these printings be executed by responsible and experienced companies or establishments; no company or establishment executing more than one printing upon the same note or obligation.

2. That one plate-printing and the seal-printing upon all national-bank notes, United States notes, and other securities of the United States be executed in the Treasury Department.

3. That the use of the so-called secret process or water-proofing in the preparation of the Government securities in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing be submitted to a commission of three disinterested and skillful persons appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury. That this commission shall investigate and decide what, if any, is the practical use of this process, and what is a fair compensation to the patentee; and whether any other process can as well or better produce the same results.

4. That the distinctive paper used in the manufacture of the United States notes shall also be used in the manufacture of the notes of the national banks.

To this was added by one member the following, with his signature:

I agree to the above, except I desire that all stamps, including postal, departmental, and revenue, should be printed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. Maynard, the chairman of the committee, submitted the minority report, signed by five members, which closes as follows:

In view of all the evidence, oral and documentary, the committee believe that the establishment of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was judicious and wise, both as a matter of safety and economy. They are satisfied that both the national Treasury and the citizen have been protected from spurious issues of currency and other securities to a degree quite impossible had they been prepared by contract with private parties. As a rule, the best work ever done is that done for the Government by regularly paid labor under official supervision, and the poorest work ever done is that done for the Government by private parties under contract, subject to official inspection when finished A Springfield musket and a shoddy blanket are instances. The safety of the Bureau is believed to consist in the superiority of the work, the constant official supervision, and the extra care to prevent and detect errors and mistakes. Without considering present cost and proposals made, there can hardly be a doubt, had the Government depended for its enormous amount of work upon the bank-note companies and individuals or firms alone, the demands would have far exceeded the sums actually paid. The number of persons capable of such work is comparatively few; they could easily combine and form a stupendous monopoly, which would hold the Government completely in its power. The Secretary of the Treasury should, therefore, have ample means to make the Bureau efficient and infallible. We are strengthened in this conclusion by the examples of the bank of England, of France, of Germany, of Austria, indeed, all the great powers of the world. The smaller and inferior governments alone of Europe and America employ private parties under contract, very largely establishments in the United States.

While having full confidence in the security of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, we are aware that an impression has obtained that greater security would be reached by having the circulation prepared in different departments and working independently of each other.

In deference to this opinion we recommend that, upon all public securities, including bonds, Treasury notes, United States notes, national-bank notes, certificates, and any other form of obligation intended to circulate as money, when more than one printing or impression is required, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to have one or more printings or impressions executed outside the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, requiring the final face impression, together with the numbering and sealing and finishing, to be executed by the Bureau.

We further recommend that all internal-revenue stamps and postal stamps, including departmental stamps, shall be printed at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and introduce a bill accordingly.

SYSTEM OF CHECKS IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT AND IN THE BUREAU.

In consequence of the investigation made by the Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment of the Fortieth Congress an entire change was made in the management of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and in the system of transacting business therein, whereby a more complete system of checks was adopted, so that under the present organization there are fourteen distinct divisions in the Bureau. As appears by the letter of Secretary Bristow to Hon. Horace Maynard, chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Forty-third Congress, under date of December 19, 1874, (see Report No. 150, Forty-third Congress, third session, page 433,) from which I extract the following:

II. The system of checks in use in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing:

The Bureau is divided into fourteen distinct divisions, with several auxiliary divisions, and the manner of business therein is substantially and briefly as follows:

In order to prevent unauthorized access to the dies, rolls, plates, &c., in the engraving division, when not in use, they are placed in vaults under combination locks, the keys of which are held by custodians representing the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer of the United States, and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, each custodian having a combination different from and unknown to the others. By a proper system of requisitions and receipts, when a "die" or "roll" is needed for the purpose of engraving or "transferring," it is charged to the workmen receiving it, and an exact account is kept of the purpose for which he receives it, and of the length of time it remains in his possession; and the custodians are required to keep a careful watch of the same while it is being used.

When a plate is needed for printing, a requisition is made by the superintendent of the printing-room in which it is needed, who gives a receipt for it and becomes responsible for its proper use. Each and every plate is checked out in the morning in this manner and at night received back and checked in, the custodian examining and inspecting it as it is passed out and returned to the vaults. Daily reports of these deliveries and receipts are made to the chief the Bureau and are examined and placed on file.

To prevent an improper use of the plates while in the printing-room, each printer is assigned to a particular press, which is numbered and to which is attached an automatic register. In the morning he receives his plate from the superintendent of the printing division and the paper to be printed by him from the superintendent of the wetting division. He is charged on his pass-book and on the books of his division with the number of sheets received by him and is credited in these books with the delivery of these printed sheets, which deliveries he is required to make in hundreds during the day as they are printed and the remainder, both printed and unprinted, at the close of his day's work, being compelled to balance his account at the end of each day.

The number of printed sheets delivered each day must correspond with the registration on the automatic register attached to the press on which they are printed, and this tally is made each day by a comparison of the reports of the custodians of these registers with the accounts of the printers in the examining and wetting divisions. These custodians of the registers are required to keep careful watch of the plates while being used, and are appointed by and responsible to the Secretary of the Treasury.

To prevent the improper abstraction of sheets of printed work, counts of all work are made in each division by two sets of counters, one verifying the work of the other. Two receipts are given when it becomes necessary to pass the work from division to division, one being subject to count and given when the work is received, the other is a final receipt given when the work has been counted and found correct. Deliveries of work from division to division are made in locked boxes, the keys of which are held only by the superintendents of divisions between which they pass. Each division superintendent makes a daily report to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the chief of the Bureau on prescribed blanks for each class of work, showing the amount received, delivered, and the balance on hand, carrying the aggregate figures forward from day to day. These reports are consolidated for each class of work, and a report thereof is made by the chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to the Secretary of the Treasury.

III. The checks in use in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury proper, which consist of the accounts kept in the currency branch of the loan division of this office, are made up from the reports of the superintendent of the Government mills where the paper is manufactured, and from the report of the various superintendents of divisions and of the chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. In order to limit the cost of engraving and printing securities, stamps, &c., the simplest plan is to make an appropriation each year at a certain fixed rate per one thousand sheets for each class of work required. This rate per one thousand sheets can be readily fixed by the average cost of each class of work during the preceding fiscal year, or upon annual estimates furnished by the Department. A specific sum should be appropriated each year for paper, as a large stock must be carried for the purpose of seasoning; also for machinery, as that always remains and possesses value after the work is done, a percentage of wear and tear being included in the fixed rate per one thousand sheets.

Since I had the honor to appear before your committee my attention has been called to the fact that the recommendation in my annual report that the entire work of engraving and printing Government securities should be done by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is contrary to the suggestion of the sub-Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment in their report in 1869. I beg to say, on this point, that the suggestions of this committee were made when an entirely different system was in operation, and when the Government securities, &c., were printed upon ordinary plain bank-note paper, which could readily be procured at any stationery establishment, either in this city or elsewhere, and also when the head of the Bureau purchased the paper in open market, and was the custodian of the same, without supervision or accountability to the Secretary or any other officer of the Treasury Department.

I trust this brief statement of the care which is exercised over the work of engraving and printing the stamps, notes, &c., issued by the Government, will give the committee an idea of the system of checks now in operation, which is followed with exactness in the minutest detail.

Speaking generally, it is perhaps sufficient to say in this connection, that inasmuch as the Department is already provided with the machinery for doing the work, there is no reason why it should not be done as cheaply here as by private parties and corporations; and such is the character of the work that it is of as much importance to keep it entirely within the control of the Government as the reduction of bullion to coin at our mints.

In conclusion, I am pleased to say, upon information derived from officers of the Department, that since the adoption of the special paper and the present system of checks, (a period of about six years,) the Government has not lost the value of one note or stamp, or even a piece of the special paper the size of a ten-cent note.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

B. H. BRISTOW, Secretary.

Hon. HORACE MAYNARD,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency, House of Representatives.

Prior to 1869 the securities named in the appendix to the gentleman's argument were supposed to be lost, stolen, or unaccounted for; since that time, under the system of checks adopted on the reorganization of the Bureau, no loss of any securities whatever has occurred. The system of checks seems to have been brought to a state of perfection, and the securities referred to there as unaccounted for or lost have no application to the Bureau; nor does it appear that they were stolen or lost. The method of their supposed loss was not fully ascertained by the committee; it lay between the companies, the Treasurer, and the Register of the Treasury Department, and there is no evidence that the Government has sustained any loss therefrom.

As showing the excellence of the system now in use in the Bureau, I refer to the reports made by the committees—copies of which I append—appointed by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury each year to make a count of the securities in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, whereby it appears that in all cases the number corresponded with the books of the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, when similar committees, appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury to count the securities in the hands of the bank-note companies, have invariably found discrepancies, as appears by letter of Secretary Bristow to Hon. Horace Maynard, chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, bearing date of June 21, 1875.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 21, 1875.

MY DEAR SIR: In compliance with your verbal request of yesterday, after careful examination and inquiry, I have the honor to state that the only discrepancies that have occurred in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing since Mr. McCartee took charge of the Bureau, by theft, embezzlement, or otherwise, are three items:

1. In December, 1869, one package of fifty-cent fractional currency of the value of $750 was abstracted during the change of work between two sets of employés, at the time we were working day and night.

2. Subsequent to the above there was a loss of two sheets of ten-dollar notes, amounting to $80, by theft by visitors to the Bureau.

3. In August, 1870, by carelessness of a printer, one sheet of dampened paper for printing tobacco-stamps was so mutilated by being mashed into pulp, that it was impossible to recognize it, but which discrepancy was detected through the agency of the register attached to the printing-press. The printer was required to pay the full value of the same, $37.50.

The other losses of the two sheets of ten-dollar notes, and the package of fractional currency notes, were paid by the Chief of the Bureau and his associates.

These losses occurred while we were perfecting the present system of checks and balances. These facts were stated before your committee by Mr. McCartee last winter, as you will see by referring to pages 252 and 253 of the testimony on "the engraving and printing of bank-notes, currency," &c.

In further compliance with your request, I beg respectfully to transmit herewith a statement showing the discrepancies discovered between the accounts of the American and National Bank-Note Companies in their exchanges of work, when the system of two printings by the bank-note companies was in operation, as shown in the semi-annual settlements of their paper accounts.

I also transmit a statement showing the discrepancies of the American Bank-Note Company in their deliveries of work to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

These lost sheets have always been paid for at the full face-value, so that no actual loss has resulted to the Government.

Very respectfully,

B. H. BRISTOW, Secretary.

Hon. HORACE MAYNARD,
Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency,
House of Representatives.

Statement of discrepancies discovered between the accounts of the American and National Bank-Note Companies, as shown in their semi-annual settlements.

Tints, $1, 2 sheets over.

FRACTIONAL CURRENCY.

Paper, 10 cents, 4 sheets short.
Backs, 25 cents, 3 sheets over.

Since the date of this letter there has been no loss or discrepancy of any kind in the Bureau.

In referring to the report of the committee of the Forty-fourth Congress the gentleman from New York omits entirely the views of the minority of the committee, but adheres to that of the majority as though it were the sole report, and quotes therefrom as follows:

"Why add 5 per cent. to the cost of securities to pay employés when they have nothing to do? Why add 25 per cent. to give employment for fewer hours and higher wages than the private company gives for the same work?"

The committee do not answer these questions, because they could not without admitting that these things were permitted only for political considerations. They say:

"If the Bureau was not already established and on our hands, it would be a question whether its operations might not properly be restricted to authenticating and finishing the Government issues."

In answer to the interjected inquiry, he omits to state that the report of the minority did show an actual saving in the Bureau over the bank-note companies of $1.71 per one thousand sheets, including not only the printing of the Bureau, but also the examination, as appears by the following comparative statement taken from their report:

Paid the New York bank-note companies, per 1,000 sheets—
For one registered printing, (back)	$23 00
For one unregistered printing, (tint)	20 00
		$43 00
Cost in Bureau per 1,000 sheets—
One registered printing, including examination, (face)	23 31
One unregistered printing, including examination, (seal)	17 98
		41 29
Difference in favor of Bureau		1 71

This saving is where there is a direct competition between the Bureau and the bank-note companies. The cost to the Government would have been far greater had there been no competition and if the companies had been permitted to charge their own rate for labor. This would seem to be a full and sufficient answer to the question which the gentleman from New York says the committee did not answer.

The charge that Secretary Bristow has not followed the course recommended by the committee of 1875, and that "he has taken the risk of departing from these instructions and of dispensing with one of these printings, and authorizing the only one performed outside of the Bureau to be executed in Washington by the Columbian Bank-Note Company," seems to conflict somewhat with the fact in this, that the report of the majority and minority of the committee differed upon that question.

The minority report recommended that one or more plate-printings should be executed outside of the Department, and the majority report recommended four plate-printings—that is, three plate-printings and the seal-printing, which would be practically four plate-printings—at least two of which should be executed by responsible outside companies, and the third plate-printing together with the seal-printing to be executed inside. There is but three distinctive printings upon these securites, and of these two are executed in the Department, namely, one plate-printing and the seal-printing, as recommended by both the majority and minority reports of the committee; but there is only one other to be executed, the fourth plate-printing having been dispensed with since 1874, it not being of any utility. The failure to have this additional costly printing done outside, which is entirely unnecessary, is the occasion of this fault-finding. So that, practically, the recommendations of both the majority and the minority has been complied with, both requiring one plate-printing and the seal-printing to be done in the Treasury Department, which has been done. Neither the majority nor the minority report recommended that the outside printing should be done in New York or any other particular place. By having the work done in Washington instead of in the city of New York there has been a large saving to the Government in expressage of partly printed securities from the companies to the Department, which amounted to $11,954.20 in 1873; the risk consequent upon the transmission of this unfinished work is also avoided, which is certainly an important matter.

THE ONE HUNDRED SHEETS.

The gentleman in his remarks says:

Secretary Bristow sent a communication to that committee concluding as follows:

"Since the adoption of a special paper and the present system of checks, a period of about six years, the Government has not lost the value of one cent or more, or a piece of paper the size of a ten-cent note."

That this statement was incorrect was proved by the production at the hearing of one hundred sheets of this special paper, of which the Bureau had no record, and by the accounts of paper delivered and received between the Bureau and the bank-note companies, by which it was shown that the paper was frequently either "short" or "over." These facts established that the Secretary of the Treasury has not adopted the best or most economical method of printing the Government notes and securities, and that implicit reliance cannot be placed upon the system of checks devised by the Bureau.

The shortage and overaccounts mentioned here have accrued in every instance with the bank-note companies of New York, as appears by the statement to which I have already referred and quoted. The Bureau of Engraving and Printing has not received, and does not receive, any blank paper, and its accounts have always proved to be correct by comparison with the accounts in the currency division of the office of the Secretary of the Treasury.

In reference to the one hundred sheets referred to by the gentleman, it would seem to be highly proper for the American Bank-Note Company, which had the one hundred sheets in its possession, to have accounted for the manner in which it came into their possession. Mr. McCartee, at that time the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, could only account for it in one way, (see Report 150, Forty-third Congress, page —,) namely, that this company had a loss occasioned by fire, whereby a large portion of the paper in their possession was claimed to be destroyed. The remains of this paper were delivered to the Bureau, alleging to represent a certain number of sheets, for which they were credited—about 15,000 in all. Three years afterward they bring forward these one hundred sheets, and they have never accounted for the manner in which they came into their possession. The only fair inference is that claimed by Mr. McCartee, namely, that this paper was not destroyed by fire and not turned over to the Bureau, and was accounted for as destroyed. This same company has recently, as will appear by the following letter, discovered an error of a similar nature. Some paper that they had paid for as lost or destroyed was afterward discovered by that company on making alterations in their establishment:

AMERICAN BANK-NOTE COMPANY,
142 Broadway, New York, March 9, 1876.

SIR: In accordance with your instructions, Mr. George B. McCartee has visited this company and made a count of the fiber-paper in our possession. The amount called for in the reports is 6,390½ sheets; the actual count makes the number 6,388½ sheets; a deficiency of two sheets. These two sheets may be discovered in the count yet to be made at the National Bank-Note Company or found in our own establishment hereafter, but they will be paid for at once, if required, in accordance with the terms of the contract.

In this connection we beg to state that in making some changes in our drying and counting rooms lately we found four impressions of twenty-five cent backs, sixteen subjects to each; one blank sheet of the distributive fiber-paper made for twenty-five cent backs, fifteen subjects to a sheet; and some fragments of sheets of United States notes and fractional currency backs destroyed by mice. The face value of all these sheets has already been paid for by this company on account of "missing sheets;" the four full impressions and the blank sheet amounting to $19.75. What the fragments originally represented of course cannot be ascertained.

After consultation with Mr. McCartee we inclose herewith the four impressions, the blank sheet, and the fragments for final destruction, leaving the question of crediting us with the $19.75 entirely optional with the Department.

Very respectfully,

C. L. VAN ZANDT, Vice-President.

Hon. B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

At all events, on every principle of honesty and fair dealing, it is for the American Bank-Note Company to explain how they came into the possession of this one hundred sheets, and not for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to do so. They have no right to attack the system of checks in the Bureau when they were permitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to account for paper alleged to be destroyed by the ashes and cinders; but above all, they have no right to attack the Bureau on this account, for this paper does not pass from the Bureau to the companies, but passes directly to them from the Government's paper-mill upon the order of the currency division of the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, which is entirely independent of the control of the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and he cannot in any manner be made responsible for it.

THE DEFICIENCY IN THE LAST FISCAL YEAR.

In reference to the deficiency in the appropriation for the last fiscal year, the gentleman charges that it was caused by a large increase of force in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which is undoubtedly true; but the increased force was occasioned directly by the legislation of the last Congress in requiring the seal on the fractional currency, which had theretofore been placed thereon by an inexpensive surface printing, to be done by a slow and expensive plate-printing. The award of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Bureau of the face printing of the national-bank notes largely increased the force, but the force employed was without doubt within what the absolute needs of the service required, and it was required to keep up with the demand.

There was no larger balance of partly finished work than the ordinary amount carried for the purpose of seasoning both the paper and the printing before issue. In two months after the Bureau discontinued manufacturing fractional currency the supply in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States was exhausted, which is a full answer to any reflection that may be intended in the gentleman's remarks upon that subject. The fact that a larger amount of fractional currency was issued in 1876 than in 1874 or in prior years does not prove that any more was issued than was required, but only that that was issued which was demanded. The demands made upon the Bureau by the Treasury had to be met, and Congress being in session could provide for the deficiency. A prudent and faithful manager of the business of the Government will always try and meet the needs of the Government. If he fails to do that, he fails to perform his duty. Acting in a ministerial capacity, it is his duty to administer the law as he finds it and leave to Congress the responsibility of any changes they may require. Secretary Bristow could not do other than he did in requiring the expensive third plate-printing to be placed on the fractional currency, although he knew that doing so would create a large deficiency.

THE WATER-PROOFING PROCESS.

Much has been said about the water-proofing process. Committees have been unable to determine whether it was of value or not, and experts and chemists seem to vary in their opinion on the subject. It is no part of my duty to attempt to prove its value or want of value. It has been used since 1871. It appears by the testimony taken before the committee that, while it was a secret process, it was not within the protection of any patent. Mr. Williams, the inventor and owner of the process, contracted with Mr. McCartee, the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, to furnish the material ready for use at a stipulated price per gallon and a stipulated number of gallons per one thousand sheets of paper, being sixty cents per gallon and seven and one-half gallons per one thousand sheets, the cost of the material per one thousand sheets being $4.50. The gentleman charges that the sum of $100,000 per year has been paid to Mr. Williams for the labor and materials in this process, and refers to Mr. McCartee's testimony before the committee of the Forty-third Congress upon that subject to prove his statement. Mr. McCartee did not seem to understand, when called upon, what the amount was per year, saying that he did not know without examining his books. The gentleman quotes from the argument of the attorney of the bank-note companies, Mr. Hubbard, at page 413 in the report of the Committee on Banking and Currency, before referred to, instead of referring to the testimony itself, to prove some of his propositions; he neglects to refer to the evidence taken before the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, his own committee in this Congress upon this subject. The testimony of Mr. Thomas J. Hobbs, who is the disbursing clerk of the Treasury Department, before our committee on the 27th of last March, shows the exact amount paid since the process was brought into use for labor and material for each fiscal year. By it it appears that the cost of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1872, was $18,875.47; for the year ended June 30, 1873, $65,742.40; for the year ended June 30, 1874, $67,897.30; for the year ended June 30, 1875, $61,731.03; for the year to date of his testimony, $52,216.40; showing that the total amount paid was $266,562.60 instead of $100,000 per year. In addition he was paid $3,860 for preparing the machinery, &c., for the use of the preparation. These are all the items of expense so far as the labor and material for the process is concerned.

As stated by the gentleman, a majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency recommended that a commission be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of ascertaining the value and utility of this process. It appears from Miscellaneous Document No. 163, part 1, Forty-fourth Congress, in the answer of the Department to the thirteenth query submitted by the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, in regard to the relative total cost per one thousand impressions for printing the seals on fractional currency by plate and by surface printing, the cost is as follows:

The cost of plate-seals on fractional currency per one thousand impressions is $16.75; the cost of surface-seals on the same, per one thousand impressions, is $4.31.

To the next question, the fourteenth:

Does the price or cost of surface printing include the expense of the process known as water-proofing? If not, what amount per one thousand impressions should be added for such process?

The reply is:

The cost of surface-printing does not include that of water-proofing; the cost of the latter is $7.82 per one thousand sheets.

This includes the cost of the material and the cost of the labor on the part of the Bureau in the application of the process.

It is claimed that the use of this process enabled the Bureau to make use of the surface-seal instead of the plate-seal, and thereby saved an expense of from $4 to $8 per one thousand sheets. Aside from the question of its affecting the value of the paper itself and its powers of endurance, it was a matter of economy to use it in order to protect the ink and prevent its spreading, and thus allow the use of the comparatively cheap surface-printed seal instead of the costly plate-printed one. The inventor, Mr. John W. Williams, testified before our committee as follows in reference to the water-proofing process, making the use of these different seals available:

Question. Why does the water-proofing process enable them to use the surface-seal instead of the plate-seal?

Answer. The surface-printed work is an impression made from raised type or raised engraving; in other words, a cameo; plate-work is sunken or intaglio. In the first case, the surface of the type takes the ink and simply deposits it upon the paper; in the other, the ink is rubbed into the plate and leaves a body of ink on the paper. When they use the surface-ink it is more easily abraded, unless protected by some process like this of water-proofing.

Q. Then I understand you to say that the water-proofing process serves to protect the ink of the surface-printing?

A. Yes; it enables them to use steam-presses to put on the surface-impression, by which they were enabled to do it very rapidly, in place of the hand-labor used to put on the plate-impressions; and this hand-labor is very expensive.

Q. Do you claim that without the water-proofing process the surface-seals could not be used?

A. They could be used, but the ink would be very readily abraded and washed away from the surface of the paper.

But the gentleman from New York alleges that the process was continued for three months after the report of the commission of experts to whom the question with reference to its effect on the paper—whether it was of sufficient value in toughening the paper to warrant its continued use—was submitted. He alleges that some informal report was made to the Secretary of the Treasury or to Assistant Secretary Conant, by Mr. Hilgard, of the commission appointed to investigate this subject, which should have caused the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue its use.

On the recommendation of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the last Congress, and in accordance with the act of Congress of March 3, 1863, Mr. Secretary Bristow referred the examination of the water-proofing process to Professor Joseph Henry, president of the National Academy of Sciences, who designated Professors J. E. Hilgard, C. F. Chandler, Henry Morton, and William Sellers to act as a commission for the purpose, and upon the 30th of August, 1876, the Secretary commissioned them as such. On the 1st of October following, Professor Hilgard, the chairman of this commission, submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury notes of the proposed report, for which see Miscellaneous Document No. 163, part 2 of this Congress, page 14. As will be seen by Professor Hilgard's letter to Professor Henry, dated the 26th of last March, page 20 of the document referred to, the commission afterward changed the opinions they had expressed in the informal report which they had already submitted; but no official report from this commission was made until the 29th of last April, when Professor Henry submitted the final conclusions, accompanied by the reports of the commission and copies of letters which had passed between himself and Professor Hilgard relative to the experiments. The final report of the commission is without date, and is on page 22 of the same document. Professor Henry dissents from the conclusions expressed therein in a letter to Professor Hilgard dated March 23, page 33, and refers the matter back to the commission for further experiments. Their reply is on page 34 and the final concluding remarks of the president of the National Academy of Sciences—Professor Henry—in which he says that he still adheres to his original opinion that the experiments and deductions deduced therefrom by the commission do not logically bear out their conclusions, (page 35.) The first conclusions of the commission expressed in their informal report was that the process was of great value and utility in strengthening the paper and preserving its durability; their final conclusions are that it is of very doubtful utility in either direction, and that it added nothing to the durability of the paper under the processes and experiments which they had applied to it.

Since that report and since the closing of the Bureau in February last, the water-proofing process has not been used, so that the question of its utility is not necessarily one for us to consider; but a reflection is attempted on the late Secretary, Mr. Bristow, for not discontinuing the process at an earlier date upon some alleged other informal report made to Mr. Assistant Secretary Conant. It appears from the letter of Professor Hilgard to Professor Joseph Henry under date of March 23 last, page 21 of the document above referred to, that on the 21st or 22d of November, 1875, he had communicated to the chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and immediately afterward to Assistant Secretary Conant the change in their views; but it appears further that the object of his first and second reports was not to stop the use of the process or to affect its use, except by a change of it from the possession of the inventor into that of the Department, and that no action had been taken on his first and informal report in that direction, and therefore no action was required to be taken on his second communication to Assistant Secretary Conant or to the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing upon it, unless, as claimed by the gentleman from New York, the use of the process should have been entirely stopped at that time. But there is nothing in the communication of Mr. Hilgard to warrant such a conclusion, for the reason that the experiments of the commission were then being made and that those experiments were continued up to December 29, when they prepared their report but did not send it in. On the 20th of November Mr. Hilgard applied by telegram to Mr. McCartee for permission to visit the Government paper-mills, and authority by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury was given on that day to the United States superintendent of the mills to permit him to inspect the manufacture of the paper. On the 23d of that month he obtained additional paper one-half water-proofed and one-half not, for the purpose of making additional experiments, and no official report was made as heretofore stated. So that there was no notice of any completed action on the subject which warranted the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue the use of the process. The object of the notice was to prevent the Department changing the mode of controlling the process by acquiring a right to it itself at a less expense than it would be to purchase the material of the inventor. Secretary Bristow would not have been warranted, and the country would not have sanctioned his stopping the use of the process if the final report had shown it to be of great value as the first informal report of the commission had shown; therefore he was right in continuing the use of the process until he had notification of the final result of their experiments.

The gentleman claims that the use of the process has made necessary an increase in the issue of fractional currency of nearly 100 per cent., and he claims that it is shown conclusively by the crucial test recommended by Professor Henry that the paper was made less durable. The gentleman's conclusions exceed those of the commission, for the commission did not find it to be less durable; the only question with them was whether it was more durable or not, and upon that, while there was no difference in opinion on the part of the experts, Professor Henry did distinctly differ with them, as did also Professor John M. Ordway, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology of Boston, and Professor H. B. Nason, of the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, of Troy, New York; so that the gentleman's conclusions as to the value of the process are not sustained at all by the commission nor by the other eminent chemists whom I have just named. And the question is whether or not the practical results prove what he states; that is, that the increase in the demand for fractional currency has been caused by an increase of its destructive quality.

It is undoubtedly true, as the reports show, that there has been yearly a large increase in the issue of fractional currency from 1870 to the time when the issue of that class of currency was discontinued; but is it true that that increase in the issue was caused by an increased destructibleness of the paper itself or was it caused by increased facilities on the part of the Department to the holders of that currency for the redemption of it by the issue of new notes? On the 1st of July, 1873, the Treasury Department issued a circular, giving minute instructions for the forwarding of fractional currency or United States notes to be exchanged for new at the expense of the Government. This was done for the benefit of the people, in order that this currency might be made more safe to them and that there should be less loss to them by its wearing out. The increased facilities under instructions from the Treasury of the United States brought in vast quantities for redemption. It was not a question how much the currency was worn, but simply that it was sent in for redemption, whether it was worn out or not. The paper issues returned to the Treasury were destroyed and a new issue made in lieu of it; and the test is not in the fact of the amount of issues, but as to how much the paper was worn that was sent in. On that subject there is no proof either pro or con; so that the fact that larger amounts were manufactured in 1876 over 1875, and in 1875 over 1870, does not prove that the paper had less durability or was more destructible in consequence of the water-proofing process. It simply proves the wide-spread desire for new and clean bills instead of old.

REVENUE STAMPS.

It is true that in July, 1874, propositions were advertised for by the Internal Revenue Bureau for furnishing revenue stamps, and that contracts were awarded to bank-note companies in New York for such stamps, and that previous to these contracts the stamps were, except the tint-work, manufactured in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. I am, however, utterly at a loss to ascertain the authority from which the gentleman makes the accusation in reference to overlapping of internal-revenue stamps. I have not been able to find anything in the report or in the inquiries propounded to the Department or in the answers thereto to warrant the statement. The Bureau of Engraving and Printing only printed the stamps prior to this contract as they were ordered by the Internal Revenue Bureau, and printed no more than was ordered; if there were any overorders made by the Internal Revenue Bureau, that Bureau was responsible, and not the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. But they only printed them in part; in other words, the tint-work, as the gentleman alleges, was provided by the bank-note companies. If they printed more of this tint-work than was needed or had been ordered, they were simply interfering with their own contracts to take effect on the 1st of January. The Bureau of Engraving and Printing could only finish what they had begun, and as I stated before, could only finish upon the order of the Internal Revenue Bureau; and therefore there is no basis for the statement made by the gentleman. It is unfortunate, to say the least, that he did not give us the authority upon which he makes this statement. It is distinctly denied by the Bureau that any such overlapping took place, and the gentleman does not give us the authority upon which he makes the charge. While I have no doubt he believes it to be true, I must be permitted to say that he is laboring under a great mistake as to facts.

In regard to stamps costing $150,000 being destroyed there must also be a mistake, for no stamps were received by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing which were not ordered by him; neither was there any destroyed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. This one-hundred-and-fifty-thousand-dollar destruction looks decidedly sensational.

I here beg leave to call attention to the following communications from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in reply to inquiries from me upon this subject:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., August 11, 1876.

Hon. W. B. WILLIAMS.

All stamps delivered by Bureau of Engraving and Printing were covered by orders, and no stamps were destroyed except when necessitated by change of tax March 3, 1875.

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT;
OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, August 12, 1876.

SIR: Referring to your telegraphic inquiry of yesterday, I have the honor to state that the act of March 3, 1875, which changed the rate of tax upon manfactured tobacco and distilled spirits took effect from and after its passage, and necessitated the destruction by this office of 372,072 stamps, costing $1,665.33, which were on hand ready for issue to collectors, but which were not suitable for issue under the aforesaid act.

This amount does not include the stamps then in the hands of collectors, many of which were used by having imprinted across the face of each the words: "Issued under act of March 3, 1875." As soon as this Office was able to furnish stamps prepared under the new act, some of the stamps in the hands of collectors were returned to the Commissioner by the destruction committee of the Treasury Department.

Very respectfully,

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

Hon. W. B. WILLIAMS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, District of Columbia.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING,
August 12, 1876.

DEAR SIR: In response to your verbal request for information in reference to the printing of internal-revenue stamps by this Bureau after the contracts for the same had been awarded to the bank-note companies of New York City in the fall and winter of 1874-'75 I have the honor to state that this Bureau received a large order from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for these stamps on the 9th of November, 1874. The aggregate amount of stamps to be finished under this order was 5,717,000, and additional and subsequent orders were received up to and including the last of December of that year; the last delivery on these orders was made on the 10th of February, 1875.

No stamps were printed or delivered to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue without his order having first been given and no stamps were delivered in excess of such orders.

Very respectfully,

HENRY C. JEWELL,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. W. B. WILLIAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington.

In regard to the saving by the printing of internal revenue stamps by the bank-note companies instead of by the Bureau it is charged that there is a saving of 25 per cent. by the contracts with the company. It must be understood that these companies did a part of this work before, the balance being done by the Bureau. The question is, whether the saving was on the Bureau work or on the work by the companies as compared with work done by them under their former contracts. If they did do the work that was done by the Bureau for less money than the Bureau charged, there was a saving, but if they did their own work for less than they received under their former contracts, while there was a saving to the Government, it was not in consequence of any excessive charges of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. And I submit in connection herewith tables of the prices per thousand sheets for stamps furnished under the old system partially printed by the bank-note companies and partially by the Bureau, and under the present system, an analysis of the contract rates of the two, which shows the saving to be in the fact that the companies did the tint-work at a much lower rate than was charged before; and while the company to whom the contract was awarded was particular to make this bid in gross, and not so as to show in detail the cost of the several printings, the bids made by other companies furnish the criterion and settle the basis upon which the contract was made; and by this analysis it appears that work for which they received under contracts theretofore made with the Internal Revenue Bureau $6.21 they now receive but $3; that for which they formerly received $4.50 they now receive but seventy-five cents; that for which they formerly received $3.94 they now receive but $1.01; that for which they formerly received $1.36 they now receive but forty-three cents; and that for which they formerly charged seventy-three cents they now charge twenty-six cents. They have in fact increased the prices for that class of labor heretofore performed by the Bureau so that work for which the Bureau received $8.50 they in fact now receive $10.75; that for which the Bureau received $5.75 the company now receive $6.25; and that for which the Bureau received $5.25 the company now receive $5.93; that for which the Bureau received $1.75 the company now receives $2.61; and stamps for which the bureau received ninety-five cents the company receive eighty-nine cents, this being the only one in this analysis which shows the companies to receive less than the Bureau received before.

The gentleman attaches to his speech an appendix of "stamp deliveries from schedule of July 1, 1874, to June 30, 1875," alleging a total of stamps manufactured for the year to be 209,137,000, and that there was delivered in the month of April 105,898,000, which were those of no value. I append to my remarks an extract from the official report of the Chief of the Bureau for the year ending June 30, 1875, found on page 30, showing an aggregate of stamps delivered to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the year to be 104,630,329, instead of 105,598,000 delivered in the month of April, as the gentleman alleges.

The letter of Mr. Jewell, present chief of the Bureau, shows that the last stamps were delivered in February, instead of April. There is no foundation whatever, that I am able to discover, for the alleged manufacture of stamps undelivered and destroyed.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

I have thus somewhat in detail gone over the position taken by the gentleman in his argument in the interest of the bank-note companies, and I can conceive of no other reason for the speech being made. As I stated before, no public interests have demanded; no demand from the people has come to Congress for any change; no demand by Congress has been made to the committee to investigate whether the change is desired or not. The system adopted seems to have been and is now working well. Why is this effort made unless it is to further the interests of the constituents of the gentleman who are engaged in this class of business?

I say here, as I did at the outset, that it is not desirable for the Government to enter into any kind of business that can be done as well, as securely, and as profitably by private enterprise; but there is no class of business in which the people are so directly interested as in the preparation of the money securities of the Government and in the money promises of the Government which pass as our money. The system of checks that has been adopted in the Bureau proves conclusively that we have a system to-day in operation that gives perfect security to the people. If it should cost more than some other system that might be devised and be experimental, it is better to adhere to the safe rule and follow it than to turn and go off on some blind track. If the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was overturned, the Government would again be entirely in the hands of these corporations, and instead of being an economical change it would prove to be a very expensive one. It needs no argument further than the facts already adduced to prove this; neither was it necessary to furnish any facts to prove it. The history of the times proves conclusively that wherever corporations can have absolute control without competition the Government interests as well as individual interests suffer in consequence. This question of business is more extensive; we could just as well say, with perhaps better grounds, that if the postal service of the United States could be done for less money and more economically than it is done now that therefore we should abolish our present postal system because it is a bill of expense to the Government and because it requires large appropriations to keep it up. Money could be saved to the Government by allowing our express companies to carry the mail; but the interests of the people would not be protected by it. Wipe out our postal system and we would be at once at the mercy of the express corporations of the country. The Government stands there and protects the rights and interests of the citizens, even though it costs her money to do it.

And again, as long as it is conceded that the mints of the United States should coin the money of the United States it should be granted that the Government should equally control the printing and issuing of its promises to pay money; if it is essential to secure the coin of the Government against adulteration and abasement and protect it from counterfeiting, that the Government of the United States should have absolute control of its coinage, I insist that it is equally true that to protect the Government against the issuing of counterfeit securities and counterfeit obligations and counterfeit paper money that the preparation of it should be entirely under the control of the Government.

We have to congratulate ourselves on the consequences of the experiment commenced under Secretary Chase when the interests of the country demanded some relief from these corporations, when the large issues incident to the war made it a necessity on the part of the Government to engrave and print its own paper obligations. The Bureau commenced at a time when the expenditures of the Government were enormous, and when in the very nature of things it required experience and talent which the Government did not have to enable it to meet its obligations with its paper promises, and it is not at all surprising that under such circumstances, without proper machinery, without a thorough system of checks, that there should be some obligations and securities of the Government unaccounted for, and we have reason to be thankful that there was no more. But all the discrepancies found in the work of this Bureau from 1861 to the present time were found to exist prior to 1867. The Government has now in its employ the best and most skillful workmen in engraving and printing in the world, and if it pays them more than bank-note corporations might be willing to pay them I apprehend it pays them no more than their services ought to be reasonably worth, and that should be the true criterion on the part of the Government and not what they would get if working for some bank-note company. The art of engraving has reached the very highest perfection in the Bureau; not only that, but the greatest improvements have been made in the line of machinery for preparing and manufacturing Government issues, and it now ranks as the largest engraving and printing establishment in the world, by its skill adding security to the obligations of the Government and giving confidence to the people.

A system so well established, with such perfect guarantees of safety, should not be overturned or destroyed without some stronger reason than the interests of private competing corporations.

REMARKS.

The cost of printing these stamps depends to a great degree on the number of stamps to be furnished, and should be increased or lessened as this amount is large or small. The aggregate cost of these stamps is therefore greater at the uniform rates of $1 and $2.50 by the bank-note companies, as shown in the first column, than by the varying rates of the Bureau in the second.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 23, 1871.

SIR: In accordance with instructions received in your letter of the 16th instant, the undersigned committee have examined the stamps and other securities (not including national-bank notes) in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, compared the same with balance sheets furnished by the chief of said Bureau, and report that we find the same to be correct.

Attached hereto is statement of said balances.

Very respectfully,

I. THORNTON,
J. W. WHELPLEY,
H. McINTIRE.

Hon. G. S. BOUTWELL,
Secretary of Treasury, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C. December 29, 1871.

SIR: In accordance with instructions contained in your letter of 19th instant, your committee have the honor to report that having caused a strict and careful count to be made of the United States distinctive paper, printed and partly printed, in Bureau of Engraving and Printing, submit the following result.

Very respectfully,

ISAAC THORNTON,
SPENCER S. GREGORY,
NEWTON FERREE,
T. C. DICKINSON,
A. B. JAMESON.

Hon. GEO. S. BOUTWELL,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 12, 1872.

Hon. GEORGE S. BOUTWELL,
Secretary of the Treasury:

In accordance with instructions contained in your letter of the 8th instant, we have the honor to report that we have caused a careful count to be made of securities printed and part printed in Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and find the amounts to agree, in every particular, with the statement of balance furnished us by the chief of currency division.

We transmit herewith a statement of the work in detail.

Very respectfully,

ISAAC THORNTON,
LEWIS D. MOORE,
S. GUTHRIE.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., December 31, 1873.

SIR: The committee appointed on the 19th instant to examine the accounts of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing so far as they relate to the printing of United States notes, bonds, fractional currency, gold certificates, currency certificates, &c., beg leave to report that we have caused a careful count to be made of the above classes of securities, printed and part printed, now in the custody of the chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and find the amounts to agree in every particular with the statement of balances furnished us by the chief of the currency division.

Appended hereto is a schedule of the various securities referred to.

Very respectfully,

GEO. D. MAHER,
LEWIS D. MOORE,
W. W. WILSON.

Hon. WILLIAM A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 13, 1875.

SIR: In compliance with the instructions contained in your letter of the 9th instant, I have the honor to report that I have superintended the counting of all the distinctive paper on hand on the morning of the 11th instant in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, of which the following is a correct statement, as shown by said count, distributed among the several divisions of the Bureau. * * *

Respectfully submitted,

F. E. GARNETT.

Hon. B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 21, 1876.

SIR: In accordance with instructions contained in your letter of the 12th instant, we have the honor to report that we have caused a careful count to be made of the securities, partially printed and complete, in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in this Department, and find the amounts to be correct according to the books of the currency division of the Secretary's office.

In making this report we desire to add, that during the entire examination we have been most favorably impressed with the evidence constantly afforded us, of the great ability and care exercised in the management of the Bureau by the late Superintendent, George B. McCartee, esq.

I. THORNTON,
W. P. TITCOMB,
FRED. W. MOFFAT.
Committee.

Hon. H. B. BRISTOW,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The Common Schools of the States—Democratic Success means the Defeat of Adequate Provision for Schools in the Southern States.

SPEECH OF HON. WM. LAWRENCE,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 15, 1876,

On the common schools of the States.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, a presidential election almost necessarily involves the consideration of many questions. I propose now to show that in the election of 1876 the democratic party should not be permitted to succeed, because the effect would be to discourage education in the Southern States and to impair the means of securing it, while the success of the republican party would encourage education and enlarge the means of securing it. I will consume no time in discussing the necessity of education to the existence and maintenance of republican government. This is so well understood, that I will assume it as a fundamental principle, affirmed by every real statesman and every reputable writer on government.

I do not overlook the fact that schools should be provided in the States under State laws. But it is important that the National Government should be in the control of a party which favors universal education, (as the republican party does,) and for several reasons, some of which I will enumerate, as follows:

1. If any State should entirely refuse to provide common schools for the education of its children, Congress would have power to intervene and establish them at the expense of the people of such State. The Constitution requires Congress to "guarantee to every State a republican form of government." (Article 4, section 4.) Common schools are agencies without which republican government cannot be maintained. The power to maintain these agencies is implied in the power to guarantee republican government.

2. The fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution declares that—

> No State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

This word "protection" is to be liberally construed to secure equal benefits arising from all laws to all citizens, including equal opportunity for education in the common schools for all children. Congress has power to enforce this provision of the Constitution "by appropriate legislation." (State vs. Adams, 4 Blackford, page 146; State vs. Pike, 15 New Hampshire, page 83; United States vs. Bailey, 9 Peters, page 238; United States vs. Winchester, 2 McLean, page 135; Rump vs. Commonwealth, 6 Casey, page 475; Mayor vs. De Armas, 9 Peters, page 224; House of Representatives No. 31, third session Fortieth Congress, pages 80–82; 2 Bishop's Criminal Law, section 987 [867]; 1 Kent's Commentaries, page 404; 13 Statutes at Large, page 437.)

It is important, therefore, that the President and Congress should be in favor of fully and faithfully executing this provision of the Constitution. The republican party is in favor of so executing it; the democratic party is not.

It will be shown hereafter that an equal provision is not made in all States for the education of white and colored youth, in clear violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution. In Delaware and Kentucky, both democratic States, the law does not permit any portion of the tax levied upon the property of white persons to be appropriated to the education of colored children.

3. The success of a national political party in favor of adequate provision for schools will necessarily exert an influence in the same direction in all the States.

I now proceed to show that the democratic party in the late slave States are hostile to education for the colored race.

The democratic party is in the majority in most of these States. It has controlled their legislation and shaped their policy. They inherited this hostility from their history and the character of their institutions. They have not yet learned to abandon the prejudices of a past age.

The suppression of the rebellion in 1865 left most of these States disorganized. These were "reconstructed" in pursuance of acts of Congress, commencing with that of March 2, 1867.

Under the Freedmen's Bureau laws, enacted by a republican Congress at the close of the rebellion, and during the era of reconstruction, schools were provided in these States and millions expended in their support. The democratic party in Congress opposed all this. This provision terminated when the States were finally reconstructed, closing with Texas, in 1870. The State constitutions adopted under the "reconstruction" laws made liberal promises for the maintenance of common schools. These were accepted and ratified by a republican Congress. But these have nearly all been since changed, and common schools are not adequately provided for. The policy of common-school education has been in a great measure ignored in constitutions, in legislation, and still more in practice.

This has been so fully shown in the able speech of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] in this House on the 29th of July, that I am relieved of the necessity of saying much that I might otherwise deem proper. He has furnished tables showing the fearful illiteracy which prevails among children of proper school age in the States of the South controlled by the democratic party. This is because of the inadequate provision made in those States for the support of schools.

To fully understand and adequately appreciate the bitter hostility to the education of the colored race existing in the democratic party to-day in the Southern States, it will be necessary to keep in mind the condition of affairs which prevailed there during the days of slavery. The unanimous sentiment against the education of colored people, whether free or slave, may be seen in the extracts from laws on the subject, some of them dating back even far beyond the organization of our present National Government.

LAWS AGAINST THE EDUCATION OF THE COLORED RACE IN THE DAYS OF SLAVERY.

South Carolina, the leader in secession, took the initiative in legislating directly against the education of the colored race. In 1740, while yet a British province, its assembly enacted this law:

> Whereas the having of slaves taught to write, or suffering them to be employed in writing, may be attended with inconveniences:
> Be it enacted, That all and every person and persons whatsoever who shall hereafter teach, or cause any slave or slaves to be taught, or shall use or employ any slave as a scribe in any manner of writing whatever, hereafter taught to write, every such person or persons shall for every such offense forfeit the sum of £100 current money.

It was not, however, till nearly a third of a century later that the State took open and direct action against the education of its free colored population under all circumstances. On the 17th of December, 1834, was passed the act of which the following is the introductory section:

> If any person shall hereafter teach any slave to read or write, or shall aid or assist in teaching any slave to read or write, or cause or procure any slave to be taught to read or write, such person, if a free person of color, shall be whipped not exceeding fifty lashes and fined not exceeding $50, at the discretion of the court of magistrates and freeholders before which such free person of color is tried; and if a slave, to be whipped at the discretion of the court not exceeding fifty lashes; the informer to be entitled to one-half the fine and to be a competent witness. And if any free person of color or slave shall keep any school or other place of instruction for teaching any slave or free person of color to read or write, such free person of color or slave shall be liable to the same fine, imprisonment, and corporal punishment as by this act are imposed and inflicted on free persons of color and slaves for teaching slaves to write. (See Barnard's report on the District of Columbia, pages 383 and 384.)

In Virginia as early as 1805 an act was passed forbidding the overseers of the poor to require black orphans bound out to be taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, showing that up to this time they had required this instruction to be given, and that slaves only were restricted. In the revised code of 1819 all meetings of free negroes or mulattoes associating with slaves in any school-house or schools for teaching reading or writing, either in the day or night, are interdicted. The same code also provided that any white person, free negro, mulatto, or Indian found in such unlawful assembly should be punished by fine of $3 and costs, and on failure of present payment "to receive twenty lashes on his or her bare back well laid on." (Barnard's report, page 307.)

In 1831 it was enacted—

> That all meetings of free negroes or mulattoes at any place for the purpose of learning to read and write should be considered unlawful assemblages, the offenders to receive corporal punishment not exceeding twenty lashes; that any white person instructing such free negroes or mulattoes on conviction was to be fined in a sum not exceeding $50, "and moreover may be imprisoned at the discretion of a jury not exceeding two months." (Barnard's report, page 308.)

If the negro were a slave the offense was punished by a fine of from $10 to $100.

In Mississippi, by act of January, 1823, any meeting of slaves, free negroes, or mulattoes, above the number of five, at any place of public resort or meeting-house in the night, or at any school-house for teaching reading or writing in the day or night, was to be considered an unlawful assembly, and the penalty was lashes "not exceeding thirty-nine."

With the permission of master or overseer, slaves might attend a meeting for religious worship conducted by a regularly ordained or licensed white minister, or attended by at least two discreet and reputable white persons appointed by some regular church or religious society. (Barnard's report, page 358.)

The Mississippi democratic Legislature of 1865, under the régime of President Andrew Johnson, enacted a law restoring and declaring to be in full force the provisions and penalties imposed upon negroes in the days of slavery, as follows:

> Be it further enacted, That all the penal and criminal laws now in force in this State defining offenses and prescribing the mode of punishment for crimes and misdemeanors committed by slaves, free negroes, and mulattoes be, and the same are hereby, enacted and declared to be in full force and effect against freedmen, free negroes, and mulattoes, except so far as the mode and manner of trial and punishment have been changed or altered by law. (Pamphlet acts of 1865, p. 165.)

The following provision of 1822 is an example of the penal and criminal laws referred to:

If any negro or mulatto shall be found, upon proof made to any county or corporation court of this State, to have given false testimony, every such offender shall, without further trial, be ordered by said court to have one ear nailed to the pillory and there to stand for the space of one hour and then the said ear to be cut off, and thereafter the other ear nailed in like manner and cut off at the expiration of one other hour, and moreover to receive thirty-nine lashes on his or her bare back well laid on at the public whipping-post, or such other punishment as the court shall think proper, not extending to life or limb.

This law remained in force until the period of the rebellion, and was revived as stated. (Barnard's report, page 358.)

In Georgia as early as 1740 it was provided by law that any magistrate or constable must—

Disperse any assembly or meeting of slaves which may disturb the peace and endanger the safety of His Majesty's subjects; and any slave found at such meeting might by order of the magistrate be immediately corrected, without trial, by whipping on the bare back, twenty-five stripes with a whip, switch, or cow-skin.

The reason for the passage of this provision of the law was, as stated, because—

The frequent meeting of slaves under the pretense of feasting may be attended with dangerous consequences.

The "feasting" referred to would include the love-feast of the Methodist Church. (Barnard's report, page 339.)

In Alabama, in 1832, an act was passed providing that—

Any person or persons who shall attempt to teach any free person of color or slave to spell, read, or write shall, upon conviction thereof by indictment, be fined in a sum not less than $250 nor more than $500. (Barnard's report, page 323.)

In Georgia, in 1829, it was enacted that—

If any slave, negro, or free person of color or any white person shall teach any other slave, negro, or free person of color to read or write, either written or printed characters, the said free person of color or slave shall be punished by fine and whipping, or fine or whipping, at the discretion of the court; and if a white person so offend he, she, or they shall be punished with a fine not exceeding $500 and imprisonment in the common jail at the discretion of the court.

A penalty of $100 was provided for the employment of any slave or free person of color in setting up type or other labor about a printing office requiring a knowledge of reading and writing. (Barnard's report, page 339.)

In Louisiana, in 1830, it was enacted that—

All persons who shall teach or permit or cause to be taught any slave to read or write shall be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than twelve months. (Barnard's report, page 350.)

PROVISIONS FOR EDUCATION IN THE RECONSTRUCTED STATES.

The constitutions of 1868 and 1869, adopted by the republican party in all the reconstructed Southern States, contained clauses requiring a system of common schools to be free to all the children of the State, that of Florida adding "without distinction or preference," and that of Louisiana "without regard to race, color, or previous condition." These educational clauses met, in every instance, determined and open opposition from the advocates of the old order of things who claimed the title of "conservatives" or democrats. This opposition arose in most cases from a deep-seated hostility to the education of colored citizens upon any terms. In Louisiana, where the constitution of the State declares that—

All the children of the State between the ages of six and twenty-one years shall be admitted to the public schools or other institutions of learning sustained or established by the State in common without distinction of race, color, or previous condition—the most unhappy condition of affairs has prevailed at times.

In the Louisiana school report for 1870, page 61, the second division superintendent gives among the obstacles in the way of free schools—

The entire lack of sympathy on the part of the oldest and best of the population with the cause of universal education.

In the State report for 1871, page 46, it is remarked, in respect to "the antagonism of a portion of the press and a powerful class of the people" that—

They have maintained an opposition active or passive, as circumstances would allow, to every advancing step which has been taken.

In the fourth division the State superintendent reports, (1874, pages 28, 29:)

Fierce and bitter manifestations of political hatred and sectional partisanship seemed to govern the dominant inhabitants. A fire of hate was kindled in the minds of many of the people.

The school officials were compelled to absent themselves from their homes from fear of personal violence; two of them, the president of De Soto Parish school board and the treasurer of Red River Parish having been murdered in cold blood. Much of this crime is ascribed by the superintendent to the influence of the "conservative" (democratic) press of New Orleans, of which it is said (page 49) that—

In modern history it would be difficult to find such another manifestation of intense caste prejudice, bitter sectional hatred, and fierce political antagonism—as was exhibited at that time by the editorials referred to.

In 1874, shortly after the rebellion in the high schools of New Orleans, which resulted in the expulsion of colored pupils therefrom, the city superintendent was suddenly beset in the street by a dozen or more young men who laid violent hands upon him and conveyed him to the girls' high school, where in presence of the assembled pupils he was compelled to apologize for language he was accused of having used concerning the mixture of races in the schools, and was also forced to sign a document by which he bound himself to prevent such mixture of races in the schools. (New York Times, December 23, 1874.)

Superintendent Brown, of Louisiana, in his annual report for 1873, in speaking of the dishonesty of the school officials in Louisiana, says:

To even notice such crimes, and by so doing confess their existence, is humiliating.

He says, however, that the reports of division superintendents indicate the absence of official integrity to an alarming degree. In the fifth division the treasurer of one parish had used the school funds on hand for his own purposes; in another, an immense fund was squandered in 1871 and 1872. In the fourth division the retiring boards were characterized by the superintendent as a demoralized, corrupt, inefficient set of men. He found nothing but fraud, rascality, peculation, and open robbery, and these in such hopeless proportions as almost to defy remedy. The same condition of affairs, in greater or less degree, was reported throughout the State.

The New Orleans Republican of March 1, 1874, in alluding to this dishonesty on the part of school officials, says it was no new thing, but that—

The reports of State superintendents for years prior to 1868 teem with complaints against parish treasurers, the majority of whom looked upon the educational fund that came into their hands as legitimate plunder. (See report of Mr. Lusher for 1867.)

The remarks of the State school commissioner of Georgia, Mr. Orr, in his report for 1875, in view of the possibility of the civil-rights bill becoming a law, as it did in the act of Congress of March 1, 1875, illustrate very well the prejudice existing in that section against the education of the two races. He says, page 19:

When it is definitely decided that mixed schools are to be forced upon us, every true Georgian, including the most ardent friends of public schools, will array himself against the system itself.

The civil-rights act did not require mixed schools, and yet the proposal by Congress to enact the bill was characterized by even this earnest friend of public schools as an attempt—

To force the white children of the South into daily contact with moral pollution.

To this intermingling of races he says the people of Georgia never will consent, though willing to do what they can "toward elevating the inferior race."

Separate schools for the education of colored children are provided for in the late slave States, except Louisiana, by laws to which reference may be made as follows:

See school laws of—
Alabama, 1871, article 6, section 3, page 19; article 11, section 4, page 38.
Arkansas, 1871, section 107, page 37.
Georgia, 1870–'72, section 20, page 9.
Kentucky, 1874, section 1, page 1, et passim.
Maryland, 1872, chapter 18, sections 1–4, pages 17–26.
Missouri, 1872, section 45, page 25. See also section 46, page 26.
North Carolina, 1872, section 20, page 25.
Tennessee, 1873, section 30, page 11.
Virginia, 1873, section 47, page 19.
West Virginia, 1873, section 17, page 12.

In all these States the establishment of free schools encountered prejudice and hostility, which in many cases resulted in open violence and outrage. In Texas the persecutions suffered by those who were laboring for the education of the colored race were as great as in Louisiana, where the system of mixed schools prevailed, showing that the main cause of the hatred of these people to a system of free schools was their opposition to the elevation of the negro upon any terms.

The Texas State school report for 1871 says:

Prejudice of the most unfounded character existed in many large communities against public schools. At every step the school department met with stubborn opposition from factions opposed to free schools. (Page 40.)

Schools for the colored race in particular had to contend with "the bitterness of unfounded prejudice." Few teachers of these schools, says the superintendent—

Have the nerve and hardihood to meet the continual insults, the social ostracism, the threats of injury, and all the annoyances that malice can invent that teachers of colored schools are subject to. Many teachers have essayed to brave all these terrors, and some few have succeeded in conquering, by patience and a long martyrdom, a peace; but in other cases intimidation and ostracism have done their work, and schools are closed for want of teachers. [Page 57.]

In communities of nearly a thousand people these teachers have been unable to procure board and often even lodging. In other instances they were taken from their homes at midnight and whipped by disguised men for no other cause than encouraging the education of the colored race. Others have wended their way to their respective school-houses in the morning only to find the building a heap of ashes, and under such adversities and threats have been compelled to resign their positions, and thus their schools were closed.

In Alabama, too, the school officers in their efforts to establish free schools met not only bitter opposition, but in many instances with insult from the people and scurrility and railing from the press. The most serious and persistent opposition to and disregard of the State system of free public schools were encountered in the city and county of Mobile. In that city gentlemen holding positions as school commissioners "repudiated entirely the authority of the board of education and the school laws enacted by the board," and were sustained by public sentiment in their open defiance of the laws of the State. (Report of 1870, page 11.)

In Mississippi, as well as in many other sections, the school-houses were in various quarters burned and the teachers driven off by mobs.

The State superintendent of schools in Georgia says:

I have labored against open and secret opposition, general apathy, and distrust. Here discrimination was quickly made against the colored people and in favor of those who had borne arms for the confederacy. (Report for 1871, page 20; school law of August 19, 1872, section 8.)

Even when the opposition of the people gradually yielded, the Legislatures and officers of the law continued to throw hinderances in the way of progress. The Legislatures of Alabama, Arkansas, and North Carolina, stimulated by the prejudices of ignorant constituents, threw obstacles in the way of local taxation for the schools, thus either destroying them in country neighborhoods or shortening them down to such brief yearly sessions that no efficient instruction could be given. The same thing was accomplished in Georgia by an opinion of the attorney-general against local taxation for the schools, (Georgia State report 1871, page 9,) the result there being an entire breaking up of free schools for the year 1872–'73, with the accumulation of a debt of $300,000 to the teachers, who had worked in expectation that the local taxes would be paid. (Georgia report 1873, page 5.) In several of the States, as Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, with apparently the plan of destroying the common-school system, it was either allowed to the people to pay their State school tax in depreciated State scrip, or to the superintendents to pay the teachers in the same; the result being that the schools got less than half their proper allowance or the the teachers less than half the amount promised them for their work. (State reports, Alabama, 1875, page 10; Arkansas, 1872, page 7.) Schools either utterly abandoned or shortened to three months in the year, with half-starved teachers conducting them in little hope, has been the natural result. In Texas the school law of 1873 so far recognized this existing state of things as to make four months a legal school year, and in Georgia and North Carolina, though the law in the former requires a six months' school and in the latter one of four months, yet this has in fact been utterly disregarded and schools maintained for three months only. (Georgia State report 1875, pages 6-20; North Carolina State report 1872, page 13.)

It is much the same in at least Alabama and Arkansas, with the addition that in the latter State provision has been made for a perpetuation of this short school term by limiting the amount of general taxation for free schools to a capitation tax of $1 on each person and two mills on the dollar on all property, and restricting the local taxation to five mills on the dollar, out of which can come nothing but an inadequate school fund and at the utmost but three months' schools.

Arkansas in the early period of its history received from the National Government donations of land for educational purposes to the amount of 1,200,000 acres. In 1860 many thousands of acres of these lands were squandered, and according to Governor Henry Rector's statement to the General Assembly, in his annual message, "only twenty-five common schools had been organized and kept in the whole State."

Directly after this came the war, when all the school funds in the treasury were seized and appropriated to carry the State out of the Union and maintain its attitude of rebellion.

When the republicans came into power, in 1868, an efficient common-school system was at once established, and in the four years thereafter 1,778 school-houses were erected and 2,302 schools were organized and in successful operation, 107,908 children were brought under instruction, and the sum of $2,298,984.79 was collected and expended for public schools.

Then the State passed into the hands of the democracy. A democratic Legislature passed a bill confirming all sales of the school lands sold during the war for rebel war bonds, &c., thus robbing the schools to a large amount; and by various vicious devices the entire system of public-school instruction was broken down and the schools suspended. (Washington Chronicle, 1874.)

The school law of the State of Arkansas, passed under authority of the democratic constitution of 1874, fails to make adequate provision for sustaining free schools even for three months in the year. The republican constitution adopted in 1868 provided:

SEC. 7. In case the public-school fund shall be insufficient to sustain a free school at least three months in every year in each school district in this State, the General Assembly shall provide by law for raising such deficiency by levying such tax upon all taxable property in each county, township, or school district as may be deemed proper.

The democratic constitution of 1874 contained the following:

SEC. 3. The General Assembly shall provide, by general laws, for the support of common schools by taxes, which shall never exceed in any one year two mills on the dollar on the taxable property of the State; and by an annual per capita tax of $1, to be assessed on every male inhabitant of this State over the age of twenty-one years: Provided, The General Assembly may, by general law, authorize school districts to levy, by a vote of the qualified electors of such district a tax not to exceed five mills on the dollar in any one year for school purposes.

The school law adopted under this constitution provides that electors of each organized school district in the State shall—

Determine what amount of money shall be raised by tax on taxable property of the district sufficient, with the public-school revenues apportioned to the district, to defray the expenses of a school for three months, or for any greater length of time they may decide to have a school taught during the year; Provided, That no tax for purposes aforesaid greater than ¼ of 1 per cent. on the assessed value of the taxable property of the district shall be levied; And provided further, That hey may, if sufficient revenue cannot be raised to sustain a school for three months in any one year, determine by ballot that no school shall be taught during such a year.

The Missouri constitution, as amended in 1875, is rather an improvement than the reverse upon the old, but the provision as to schools met with great opposition and barely escaped rejection.

Under the constitution adopted by the republicans of Texas in 1869 it was provided:

SEC. 4. The Legislature shall establish a uniform system of public free schools throughout the State.

SEC. 5. The Legislature at its first session, or as soon thereafter as may be possible, shall pass such laws as shall require the attendance on the public free schools of the State of all the scholastic population thereof for the period of at least four months of each and every year.

SEC. 7. The Legislature shall, if necessary, in addition to the income derived from the public-school fund and from the taxes for school purposes provided for in the foregoing section, provide for the raising of such amount by taxation, in the several school districts in the State, as will be necessary to provide the necessary school-houses in each district, and insure the education of all the scholastic inhabitants of the several districts.

Section 9 makes it—

The imperative duty of the Legislature to see to it that all the children in the State within the scholastic age are without delay provided with ample means of education.

PROVISIONS OF THE TEXAS SCHOOL LAW PASSED MAY 22, 1873.

The Texas school law of 1873 provided for the election of a State superintendent of public instruction, to hold office for four years, and to receive a salary of $3,000 a year; also, for the election of a board of five school directors in each county. The president of this board was to be ex officio county superintendent of public instruction. The members of the board were to receive pay at the rate of $4 each per day for every day employed, provided the time did not exceed twenty days for the first year and ten for the second. The county superintendent was allowed $4 per day for each day actually employed, provided the time did not exceed thirty days in any one year.

The board of trustees were required to provide the necessary schools for the scholastic population, separating the white and colored race, and to see that the schools were attended at least four consecutive months in each school year.

Aside from these limitations of county-school superintendents and other officers to a few days' work for the schools during the year, the school law of 1873, as a whole, would appear, at the first glance, to be reasonably efficient. Its weakness, however, was soon evident to the school officers of the State. The State superintendent remarks, in his report for 1874, pages 38 and 39:

Power should be invested in some one to compel officers connected with the administration of the school law to discharge their duties.

It is true the law gives the superintendent authority to issue instructions and regulations binding on all officers and teachers; but it is equally true that sheriffs and school officers can obey or disregard them just as they please. The superintendent is powerless to enforce observance. The same is true with regard to the authority of county superintendents and boards of directors to enforce observance of their rules and regulations on the part of teachers and trustees.

Authority to direct must be accompanied by power to enforce.

In some counties schools have been organized in every district and the doors of the public school-houses opened to every child in the county, thus furnishing evidence of efficiency on the part of the school officers and of a hearty co-operation and liberal support upon the part of the people. In many other counties schools have been only partially organized, leaving many districts entirely destitute, owing in some instances to the neglect of school officers, in others to the antagonism of the popular sentiment, and in still others to the sparsity of population, want of suitable school-houses, and similar unavoidable causes.

The Daily Journal (Texas) of September 29, 1873, says:

Under the republican school law of the Twelfth Legislature, good schools, with competent teachers, were opened in every part of the State, affording to all equal facilities, and kept open eight months in the year. Under the democratic school-law of the Thirteenth Legislature the attendance was reduced one-half.

The great object of the democratic constitutional convention of 1875 was to defeat the school system, or what remained of it. Many of the delegates evinced great hostility to the common-school system and a firm purpose not to vote for taxation for this object. One of them went so far as to say that it was "the school tax that the people complained so much about;" that it was—

The main expense and burden that had induced them to call this convention. They could have borne the other taxes. They want the power of the State to tax for such purposes limited by this body. (Christian Era, Boston, November 4, 1875.)

In respect to the provisions of the new constitution of Texas, submitted to the people and adopted February 15, 1876, the State school commissioner says:

I deem it unnecessary to make any recommendations as to future legislation upon this subject since, by the terms of the proposed constitution, it is for the present impracticable to establish and maintain any general system of public free schools.

The act of Congress of 30th of March, 1870, (United States Statutes, volume 16, page 80,) says:

The performance of these several acts in good faith is a condition-precedent to the representation of the State (of Texas) in Congress.

It also says—

That the State of Texas is admitted to representation in Congress as one of the States of the Union upon the following fundamental conditions, namely: * * * Third, that the constitution of Texas shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the school rights and privileges secured by the constitution of said State.

Now, the constitution has been so changed as to deprive citizens of the school rights enumerated.

The late constitution provided for public schools for at least four months in the year, and also that—

One-fourth of the annual revenue derivable from taxation shall be levied and collected for the benefit of public schools.

The new constitution does not make it obligatory upon the State government to levy, collect, or set apart one cent of the revenue derivable from taxation to schools.

The constitution of Alabama, as amended in 1868 by the republican party, makes it the duty of the board of education—

To establish throughout the State, in each township or other school district which it may have created, one or more schools at which all the children of the State between the ages of five and twenty-one years may attend free of charge.

Ample provision is made for sustaining these free schools. In addition to the amount accruing from the school fund, it is provided (section 2) that—

One-fifth of the aggregate annual revenue of the State shall be devoted exclusively to the maintenance of public schools.

SEC. 12. The General Assembly may give power to the authorities of the school district to levy a poll-tax on the inhabitants of the district in aid of the general school fund, and for no other purpose.

SEC. 13. The General Assembly shall levy a specific annual tax upon all railroad, navigation, banking, and insurance corporations, and upon all insurance and foreign-bank and exchange agencies, and upon the profits of foreign bank-bills issued in this State by any corporation, partnership, or persons, which shall be exclusively devoted to the maintenance of public schools.

DIFFICULTIES ENCOUNTERED IN TENNESSEE.

Some conception may be formed of the difficulties and hinderances which public-school instruction met in the reconstructed States from a brief account of these in one of them. For instance, the first working superintendent of instruction that came into office in the State of Tennesse states, in his first report, published in 1869, that—

Only here and there had any community complied with any requirement, [of the school law.] Rarely had one here elected directors, and another there taken the census, or another attempted to get a school-house ready. * * * The scholastic population had [under the old law] been reported to the State, and the State fund for distribution had been apportioned and paid out to the trustees of counties. But the State did not know, and could not tell, whether a dollar was expended as the law required, whether it was used for public or for private purposes, or whether there was a school taught or a child taught or not. The provisions of the code had been a dead letter in all respects during the war, and after the re-organization of the State government till the passage of the new law. But the new law was hardly less a dead letter for seven months after its passage, for nothing had been done completely save to levy a tax and proceed with its collection.

Even as to this he says:

The revenue officers of the State assured me that they had no moneys in the treasury; that there having been no schools in operations to call for the money, it had been, in the State's distress, used, like other revenue, to liquidate the State indebtedness.

The comptroller assured me he could not see how the money for school purposes could be spared. Others thought the schools should be delayed in organization till the State had reduced its debt and could conveniently disburse money for education. From other quarters there was expressed a bitter and determined opposition to the organization of schools because the law provided for the equal instruction of colored people. Some declared its passage only a political trick. The deep prejudices and strong passions caused by the war had not entirely passed away. The system was to be launched like a ship upon a sea swelling and surging under the influences of the overpast storm.

With great difficulty and by great exertions the superintendent succeeded in inaugurating the system of instruction that the law provided for and having schools established under it in almost every portion of the State. But so inveterate was the opposition of the old opponents of the system that within a year a democratic Legislature overthrew the whole State organization of instruction, erecting in place of it what is called the county system, by which the whole matter of the establishment of schools is remanded to the discretion of the counties without any obligation that a single school shall be established and without a penalty if none be carried on! The result was that out of ninety-three counties forty-four levied no tax for schools, several others made no report of any action, and the greater portion of the others levied so small a tax that either no schools could be supported by it or the sessions had to be made so short as to destroy all hope of their efficiency. This state of things was too bad for very long endurance, and after two years' trial of it a new school law was enacted restoring the main features of the one that had been overthrown. But even under this a superintendent of instruction who began with ardent hope of accomplishing much for education found great difficulties in his way.

In the State of Virginia the constitution of July, 1869, adopted by a republican convention, made ample declarations requiring common schools.

The democratic Legislatures which have controlled the State since that time have failed to make adequate provision for schools. State officers have been generally elected because of their known opposition to laws which would make adequate provision. The facilities for education are adequate to supply but a small portion of the children of school age. (Globe, volume 75, part 1, page 402, for 1869–'70; Paine's speech.)

PROVISIONS FOR EDUCATION IN THE NON-SECEDING LATE SLAVE STATES.

In the former democratic slave States which remained within the Union and therefore had no new constitutions with educational clauses included in them imposed after the war, the system of free schools has also found an uncongenial soil and has had to work upward through much opposition.

Delaware and Kentucky have never made any changes in their constitutions to correspond with the requirements made by the fourteenth article of amendments to the constitution in favor of equal privileges for all regardless of race or color.

In Delaware, where the school law of 1829 continued in force until in 1875, the whole question of the establishment or non-establishment of schools was put into the hands of the people of the several school districts, so that in poor and ignorant districts where they were most required they were least likely to be established; and where they were established they were for white children only, no provision being made by law for any education of the colored population. In the winter of 1875 a law was passed providing for a special taxation of thirty cents on the one hundred dollars of the real and personal property of colored persons for the support of colored schools. These funds, however, were not to be disbursed through the regular school officers, but were given into the hands of the Delaware Association for the Education of Colored People to be dispensed by them. In the words of the law:

SEC. 2. All the moneys collected under this act shall be paid as other taxes to the county treasurer in each county, which he shall keep as a separate fund, and which shall be paid by him to the treasurer of the Delaware Association for the Education of Colored People. The fund arising under this act shall be applied by said association to the support and maintenance of colored schools throughout this State.

The workings of this law up to date may be seen from a statement in the Pennsylvania School Journal of July, 1876, from which it appears that none of the tax referred to has been paid over as yet, and as a consequence only thirteen or fourteen colored schools are now in operation in the State.

In Maryland, where a fair school system was established immediately on the conclusion of the war, the colored population were also wholly ignored at first, and only after lengthened pressing of their claims have succeeded in obtaining, first, a recognition of their need of education, and, finally, a share in the distributable State school fund.

In Kentucky, where a school system was established as far back as 1838, the superintendent of instruction, in his report for 1867, speaks of the legislative bodies of the State as having been almost uniformly unfriendly, indifferent, or evasive as to the cause of popular education, and expresses the opinion that the then declining condition of the school system was chargeable in large degree to the want of appreciation, neglect, or positive hostility of past Legislatures. The large colored population have notwithstanding earnest efforts been unable to obtain for their children any school privileges. And only since the year 1874 has the boon been accorded to them of having their own school fund out of the State taxes paid by them. But as in their poverty these taxes are extremely light, the whole amount which it is estimated they will get from this source is about $20,000 for 37,000 colored children, against about $1,000,000 for 437,000 white ones; that is, fifty-four cents for each colored child to $2.30 for each white child.

Almost the same remarks apply to Missouri as to Kentucky. Obstruction, rather than encouragement, of a truly universal education is the rule in every one of the old slave States where what is called "conservatism"—which means the control of the democratic party—has sway. The colored people get their right to education recognized only through hard struggles, by slow steps, and in the face of a determined opposition.

In this connection I present a table showing the legal school age in the States therein, the money expended in each per capita of school population, per capita of pupils enrolled, and the per capita of average school attendance.

To this I will add the following tables. These tables will show that a large proportion of the children in the States of the South controlled by the democratic party enjoy no school privileges, and the reason in good part is that no adequate provision is made.

EXPENDITURES FOR EDUCATION IN THE SOUTHERN STATES BY RELIGIOUS AND BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATIONS IN THE NORTH.

The American Missionary Association opened a school among the escaping fugitives that took shelter under the guns of Fortress Monroe, September 17, 1861, only five months after the war began. This was the first freedmen's school in the United States, but others soon followed. Nearly all denominations of Christians in the Northern States were aroused to activity, and sent missionaries and teachers to follow up the march of the Army, so that schools quickly took the place of encampments.

During several years after the war this society supported annually upward of five hundred missionaries and teachers in the South, and numbered over forty thousand pupils in its schools. In the last twelve years it has expended in the South, in its educational and religious work, about $3,000,000. (Report of Trustees of Fisk University, 1876.)

It is impossible to give an exact estimate of the expenditures of the many other religious and benevolent societies of the country (sustained principally at the North) for education in the Southern States during the past decade. Nearly every religious denomination had its share of the good work.

The United States Commissioner of Education in his report for 1871 gives the amount expended by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church during the five years ending May 1, 1871, as $220,704.

The Baptist denomination in the District of Columbia expended $36,000.

The Freedmen's Aid Society at Cincinnati, before this society was merged in the American Missionary Association, expended $134,340.53. (Report of United States Commissioner of Education, 1871, page 6.)

WORK OF THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

There were expended by the Freedmen's Bureau, established by a republican Congress, for education among the colored people, as reported by Major General O. O. Howard, Commissioner, from 1865 to 1871, the sum of $3,711,235.04 in cash, and in other expenditures than cash, $1,551,276.22; total, $5,262,511.26. (Report of United States Commissioner of Education, 1871, page 6.)

The report of General Howard for 1869 gives some of the results of this work for each year, as follows:

At the end of the first year, July 1, 1866, the official report gave 975 schools, 1,405 teachers, and 90,778 pupils. In 1867 the numbers reported were 1,839 schools, 2,087 teachers, and 111,442 pupils. In 1868 there were 1,831 schools, 2,295 teachers, and 104,327 pupils; and in 1869 official reports give 2,118 schools, 2,455 teachers, and 114,522 pupils. These figures do not include many evening and private schools, which have not been reported. It is believed that not less than 250,000 colored adults and children have received some instruction during the past year.

AID RENDERED EDUCATION IN THE SOUTH BY THE PEABODY FUND.

The expenditures of the Peabody fund for education in the South it is estimated have averaged about $100,000 a year since the beginning of its disbursements in 1868, the total amount, including that expended in 1875, being $775,390; while the expenditures up to this time would increase the result by about $100,000 more, making a grand total of nearly $1,000,000.

But I cannot now go further in a discussion of this subject. I have demonstrated the propositions with which I set out.

And in view of our duties under the Constitution, I will, when I can get the floor for the purpose, offer the following:

Whereas the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution declares that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law; and whereas this provision was designed to secure to all citizens the equal benefit of all laws: Therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor be, and are, instructed to ascertain whether in any one or more States an equal opportunity for common-school education, including school privileges for equal time, is secured to colored and white children; and, if not, that said committee report such bill as may be proper to enforce the Constitution in this respect.

Internal-Revenue Laws—Cigar Manufacturers Unfairly Taxed and Restricted.

SPEECH OF HON. A. S. WILLIAMS,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 15, 1876,

On the bill (H. R. No. 3926) to amend the laws relative to internal revenue.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, it is to be regretted that the bill to amend the internal-revenue laws reported from the Committee on Ways and Means cannot be acted upon this session. It contains many just and salutary amendments of the existing unnecessarily harsh laws. There are, I think, however, some points affecting an interest which has become in this country one of great magnitude that have been overlooked by the committee, and upon which I shall propose amendments when this bill is considered by the House. I refer to the cigar-manufacturing interest, which in the last fiscal year paid into the Treasury over $10,000,000 as a revenue tax, and which, if fostered by a fair and just policy of taxation, would supply the entire demand of the nation for cigars, whether of foreign or domestic tobacco. We imported in the last fiscal year 57,345,000 cigars, mostly from Cuba, the manufacturing of which would have been added to our own industries but for the unfair discrimination of the taxes (customs and excise) against our own manufacturers. The statements contained in a circular which I shall append to my remarks furnish abundant proof that the further change proposed in a pending tariff bill will work still more to the disadvantage of our own manufacturers without benefiting our revenues.

Several very excellent speeches have been made during the present session upon the harshness, the irregularities, and the frauds in the administration of our revenue laws; but very little has been said touching the defects of the laws themselves. These are very manifest in the harsh, restrictive, and wasteful character of some of the provisions respecting the important interest I am now considering. And to these unwise provisions has been added by the administrative department of the Government a system of regulations in some instances arbitrary and despotic, the enforcement of which is confided to agents whose actions are not unfrequently controlled by interested motives or governed perhaps by some spasmodic impulse or idea as to the obligations of his official duty.

A year or so ago a revenue official, since come to grief in the whisky rings, appeared in the commercial metropolis of the State I have the honor in part to represent and suddenly pounced upon and seized all the cigars of the largest manufacturers of that city. It had been the practice of all these manufacturers, under the consent and advice of the revenue collector, to remove their cigars from one room to another of the same building (licensed as a manufactory) for the convenience of packing and storing, and stamps were not affixed until they were ready for delivery and removal from the building used as the manufactory.

Even the harsh regulations of the Revenue Bureau provide that cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes only when "removed from the place of manufacture must have affixed and canceled proper internal-revenue stamps," &c.; and again, declare forfeited only "cigars removed from any manufactory or place where cigars are made," &c. And yet this official guardian of the revenue laws, overruling the clear meaning of the law, the decision of the local collector, and the trade usage of years, of his own uninstructed volition takes into his possession tens of thousands of property of honorable and honest men and levies upon them a fine in addition to the heavy expenses and losses of this most atrocious proceeding. And this is by no means a solitary instance of the "insolence of office" practiced in the execution of the laws by a swarm of peripatetic revenue agents.

No one certainly will question the obligation of the Government to guard with vigilance these important sources of our national revenue, or that the revenue laws, whether of imposts or excise, should be carefully and rigidly enforced. But an excessive multiplicity of penal revenue laws, hedged around with vexatious and useless conditions of bonds, oaths, registrations of residences, and the like provisions of some parts of our laws, enforced by regulations of doubtful legality and of varying and uncertain construction, to be put into execution by a swarm of political traveling agents, seldom produce salutary results, either upon the prosperity of industrial trades, or upon the fair and full collection of the revenues, or upon the successful and impartial administration of the laws, or upon the moral character of the people. The ancient penal code of England, that imposed the death penalty upon minor and insignificant offenses, effected no diminution of crime, but rather aggravated the criminal spirit of the offenders. Honest officials, not mere political agents, are more needed than severer laws and regulations. The following may be considered some of the principal provisions of the internal-revenue laws relative to the cigar manufacture that require amendment or repeal.

First. Section 3244 of the Revised Statutes, seventh subdivision, which imposes a tax of $500 upon retail dealers in leaf-tobacco upon $1,000 of sales and fifty cents upon each dollar of sales in excess of the first $1,000 of sales.

Dealers in leaf-tobacco pay a special tax of $25, and their sales are limited for home consumption to other dealers, who have paid a special tax, and to manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, and cigars, and they can sell only in original package.

Our cities and larger towns abound in a class of cigar manufacturers of small means who do their work at home, aided perhaps by their families. They have not the means to buy a whole original package of imported or domestic tobacco, costing several hundred dollars. They are, therefore, driven to purchase of the retail dealers in leaf-tobacco, and thus pay fifty per cent. more for their raw material than the larger manufacturer, who is able to buy from the "dealer in leaf-tobacco" and in the original packages. The poor and the rich cigar-maker affix the same stamp value to the box of manufactured cigars, but the poor cigar manufacturer by the operation of these laws pays fifty cents more upon each dollar's cost of the material upon which he expends his labor. He is deprived of the privilege of competition and deprived too of a source of livelihood and support for himself and family. The discrimination is severe and unjust, and should be removed by allowing all licensed manufacturers of cigars to purchase leaf-tobacco in large or small quantities of any licensed dealer or other licensed manufacturer of cigars.

Second. The present law compels a total erasure of stamps from cigar-boxes, but it prohibits the further use of the boxes, even after the stamp has been "utterly destroyed."

It is estimated that the cost value of boxes thus uselessly wasted or destroyed amounts to a million and a quarter of dollars annually, and probably with other tobacco packages there is a senseless destruction of over two millions a year in boxes and packages. The effect has been to increase the price of cigar-boxes (all made of foreign wood) in western markets from six cents to fifteen cents each. It is now a penal offense to be found in possession of an empty cigar-box, even when the stamp has been wholly erased.

Third. Every cigar-maker is required to register his name with the revenue collector, and the place of his employment, under a penalty of $5 for each day's neglect.

This is an odious and onerous requirement not exacted in any other cases from operatives, and is not of the least practical utility. The pending bill, I am glad to see, repeals this offensive and absurd provision.

Fourth. Another useless and onerous hinderance to the free exercise of the cigar-maker's trade is the exaction of a bond with sureties. What with registrations, statements under oath, severe penalties for violation of revenue laws, frequent inspections, and numerous other contrivances and provisions to secure the stamping of manufactured cigars, the bond, it would seem, might safely be omitted. It excludes thousands of men of small means who are unable to furnish the required sureties from following their professional occupations, which would furnish an abundant support for themselves and families and in reality adds nothing to the abundant safeguards that the law already provides for collecting its revenue duties.

Fifth. The act of March 3, 1875, increased the tax on domestic cigars from $5 to $6 per thousand, without increasing the duty on foreign cigars, thus giving further advantages to the foreign manufacturer, whose cigars are admitted at a comparatively low duty, while the foreign tobacco which enters into the manufactured cigar of our own workmen is taxed from seventy-five cents to eighty-five cents per pound; over three times greater than the tax paid on any other kind of manufactured tobacco.

Sixth. Section 3397 of the Revised Statutes prohibits the removal of any cigars from a manufactory or place without being packed and stamped. The official construction of what is a "manufactory" has been uncertain and variable and the cause of great annoyance and expense to the manufacturer. I have already spoken of an instance of oppressive practice under this provision. When a building is licensed as a manufactory of cigars common sense would suggest that all the rooms of the entire building could safely be used for manufacturing purposes. The revenue officials conflict in their decisions. In one case I have seen a lattice fence made across a lower room of a large building by order of a revenue agent to define the limits of the factory across which the unstamped cigar could not pass with impunity!

This section requires amendment so as to permit the manufacturer to use his whole factory building for his licensed purpose. He should be limited solely to the building used as his factory.

It is the duty of the Government to encourage the home manufacture of cigars. It is an interest which has grown with wonderful rapidity, giving employment to tens of thousands of worthy men. It would extend to a supply of our entire home demand but for the disadvantages arising from unequal duties and taxes upon domestic and foreign products and manufactures of tobacco and the onerous and useless restrictions and hinderances of the revenue laws. A judicious revision of the internal-revenue law relating to this branch of industry will give profitable employment to thousands who are now struggling for a bare livelihood or are actually unemployed by reason of unwise national legislation, and it would add millions to a source of revenue that now pays over ten millions on manufactured cigars annually into the Treasury. I incorporate into my remarks the subjoined statement from experienced manufacturers bearing upon the operations of the present tariff laws, and showing the existing and proposed discriminations against our own people in one of the important branches of home industry.

This circular says:

In reference to the proposed rates of tariff on tobacco and cigars, (40 cents per pound for the former and $3.50 per pound for the latter,) we will prove to you by statistics and facts that the Government is not benefited nor the manufacturers protected. Under the present tariff there has been imported into the United States, according to the statement of Mr. Edward Young, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, 57,345,000 Havana and other foreign cigars, whereas the manufacturers of the United States have produced and stamped 1,869,317,000, or nearly thirty-three times as many, which is sufficient proof that the manufacturers' interest is a very significant one and should have much weight and consideration before Congress. Should the proposed tariff become law the manufacture of fine cigars, which constitutes a leading feature in this branch of industry, would receive a heavy blow, and those enterprising manufacturers, who are established all over the United States, and whose specialty is to make only high grades of cigars to compete with imported Havana cigars, are men who contribute immensely toward the revenue, besides giving employment to many thousand workmen.

The price of Havana cigars imported to this country is from $60 to $100 per thousand; shipping expenses and export duties accruing thereon before leaving Cuba are about 12 per cent., and to show you how disadvantageously the proposed tariff compares with the present one and would work against both the Government and the manufacturers, we give you figures, as follows:

One thousand cigars, Havana, cost $60 gold, weighing twelve pounds.

	Present tariff.	Proposed tariff.
Cost	$60 00	$60 00
Twelve per cent. export duties and expenses	7 20	7 20
Total	67 20	67 20
Twenty-five per cent. ad valorem	16 80	.....
Twelve pounds, at $3.50	.....	42 00
Twelve pounds, at $2.50	30 00	.....
Total	114 00	109 20
Loss to the Government on each thousand	.....	4 80
Total	.....	114 00

Reduced protection to the manufacturers	$4 80
Proposed increase of duty on tobacco, 5 cents per pound, taking thirty pounds to one thousand cigars	1 50
Total	6 30

Again, one thousand cigars, Havana, cost $100, weighing fourteen pounds.

	Present tariff.	Proposed tariff.
Cost	$100 00	$100 00
Ten per cent. export duties and expenses	10 00	10 00
Total	110 00	110 00
Twenty-five per cent. ad valorem	27 50	.....
Fourteen pounds, at $3.50	.....	49 00
Fourteen pounds, at $2.50	35 00	.....
Total	172 50	159 00
Loss to the Government on each one thousand	.....	13 50
Total	.....	172 50

Reduced protection to the manufacturers	$13 50
Proposed increase of duty on tobacco, 5 cents per pound, taking thirty pounds to one thousand cigars	1 50
Total	15 00

This proposed tariff would hardly increase the consumption, and to equalize the amount of revenue derived from the present tariff the imports would have to increase at least 20 per cent. The proposed increase of 5 cents per pound on Havana tobacco will not, in our judgment, benefit the Government any, and we are confident the present rate is all the article can stand, and any change could only result in a diminished revenue. We would finally request in the present already depressed condition of our tobacco leaf and cigar manufacturing trade not to change the present ruling tariff.

Economy, Retrenchment, and Reform.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN REILLY,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

August 15, 1876,

On economy, retrenchment, and reform.

Mr. JOHN REILLY. Mr. Speaker, at the commencement of the present Congress we were confronted with the fact that the country was in a greatly depressed condition, many of the great manufacturing industries closed and the workmen thrown out of employment, and of those that continued business the employés receiving low wages and not being employed full time, trade of all kinds dull and unprofitable; distrust prevailed in monetary circles, and failures and bankruptcies were numerous, nearly eight thousand failures being reported during the year with losses of over $200,000,000; and this does not represent the larger number of poor men whose properties have gone at sheriffs' sales, under the hammer, for amounts so small perhaps that in the great monetary reports they would not be dignified with the name of failures, but they probably entailed greater suffering than some whose figures were large enough to admit into the reports. With the country in this condition, what was the duty of the Representatives of the people called together to legislate in their interest? There could be but one answer to that, a prompt reduction of the expenditures in every branch of the Government, and that the House of Representatives proceeded to do, with the following result: The estimates presented by the Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, for the twelve regular appropriation bills, were $173,590,822.48; this was reduced to $109,244,140.42 by the House of Representatives, making a reduction from the estimates of $64,374,672.06, and $38,910,984.29 under the appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1876.

The necessity for these reductions will be apparent to every business or thinking man in the country who may give the subject any attention.

In the organization of the House I was assigned to duty on the Committee on Military Affairs, and from service on that committee can speak more particularly on the proposed reduction of expenses in the Army than of the other branches of the service. Early in the session a circular letter was sent to a large number of the old and experienced officers of the Army to ascertain their views on the reduction of expenses, in order that there should be none made that might injure the service in any way. Quite a large number were examined before the committee, and their testimony and the replies of the others are to be found appended to the report of the committee, No. 354, report and testimony making a document of two hundred and thirty-four pages. One of the inquiries was as to the propriety of transferring the Indian and Pension Bureaus to the War Department, and that being one that promised the greatest saving I take that up first.

General Sherman on that answers:

The transfer of the Indian Bureau would result in economy and efficiency. * * * I firmly believe that the Army now occupies the positions and relations to the great mass of the Indian tribes that will better enable the Government to execute any line of policy it may deem wise and proper than by any possible system that can be devised with civil agents.

The following are extracts from the testimony of Lieutenant-General Sheridan on the subject of the transfer given before the committee:

Mr. THORNBURGH. In the absence of the chairman of the committee, I will ask you to give your opinion as to the propriety of changing the conduct of Indian affairs from the Interior Department to the War Department. In your answer to the question you may give fully your views connected with that subject.

General SHERIDAN. I have always been in favor of the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department. It would relieve the military establishment of great expense and much annoyance. We could diminish the number of posts and be enabled to establish new agencies, when required, at posts already established, instead of being required as we now are to establish a new post for every new agency. This transfer would put an end to the conflict of authority occurring constantly between Indian agents and Army officers; and would also relieve the Government of very much of the expenses of the Indian Bureau, such as pay of agents, &c.

Question. Please state in detail how the building of a post accumulates expense.

Answer. The first expense is the money necessary to construct the buildings; then the transportation of troops and all kinds of supplies which are required at these remote points.

Q. You think that the expense to the Government in looking after its Indian affairs would be much less by reason of the transfer?

A. To come squarely at the subject, should the Indian Bureau be transferred to the military, I have not the least doubt that the Secretary of War would modify his estimates for the coming fiscal year to the amount of $3,500,000, and this will only be a commencement. I have the assurance of the Secretary for this reduction.

By Mr. COOK:

Q. In addition to getting rid of the expense of Indian commissioners, &c.?

A. Yes, sir; I am speaking of reduction in our own expenses, not what may be saved in Indian affairs. The reduction above referred to, I wish it to be understood, does not embrace the reduction which can be made in the Ordnance, Engineer, Subsistence Departments, &c.; it means the saving we can make in the disbursements through the Quartermaster's Department; and I repeat the sum, $3,500,000.

By Mr. THORNBURGH:

Q. And that amount could be saved?

A. The Secretary could strike off that amount from the estimates of Army expenses proper, such as regular supplies, transportation, purchase of horses, incidental expenses, &c.

Q. Please state how you think the Indians would be benefited.

A. It is my belief that if the Indians had been in the hands of the military there never would have been any Indian wars of any consequence. There would be a power over them which would make them respect persons and property, and they would respect that power. The attempt is now being made to govern these Indians without exercising any power over them at all, by simple suasion, while at the same time we acknowledge the necessity of having the severest laws for the government of intelligent white people.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. They seem to trust the officers of the Army more implicitly than they do civilians, do they?

A. Yes, sir. The military will never make a promise without fulfilling it; while at present there are almost nothing but broken promises, arising much from the fact that the Indian Bureau has not the necessary organization or machinery to fulfill its promises.

By Mr. REILLY:

Q. One of the objections we hear urged against the proposed transfer is that the Indians when placed on reservations need to be taught to take care of themselves, to be trained in agriculture and the industrial arts, and that the Army cannot give such instruction. Why cannot the Army, employing men who have knowledge of the business, give such instruction just as well as it is given under the present management?

A. They can do it a great deal better, because the military could, to some extent, compel the Indians to labor on individual tracts of land. I have had considerable experience in this reservation system for Indians, and it works well. I even obliged them to send their children to school.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. Under the present system, you have one set of disbursing officers for the Army, issuing rations, &c., and another set under the Indian Bureau?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Could not those functions be concentrated in the Army officers without any additional expense?

A. Yes, sir; there would be no additional expense except from the transportation of additional supplies, and we could transport cheaper than the Indian Bureau, because we have a much better machinery.

Q. You have the Army wagons and teams?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Transportation for the Indian Bureau has to be done by contract with civilians?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is not that often a very profitable business to civilians who get the contracts for transportation?

A. Yes, sir; for instance, the Spotted Tail band had its agency on the Missouri River at the Whetstone agency, where all supplies could be landed from steamboats, and it was thought best to move it out on White River, (a distance of about two hundred and fifty miles,) for no other purpose, in my belief, than to employ wagons. Certainly the new is not half so good as the old agency; and we have been forced to the expense of constructing a new post to protect the agent and Indian supplies.

Major-General Winfield S. Hancock replies as follows:

I believe it would be a decided advantage to the country, to the Indian, and the pensioners to transfer those Bureaus to the War Department, and in regard to Indian matter especially, I may say that I believe there is no motive save the interests of the Indians and those of the country, which would lead Army officers to advocate or advise such a transfer, for it could but add to their labors and responsibilities, and would invite hostile criticism injurious to the Army at large, should cases of maladministration by individuals occur.

Major-General Irvin McDowell says of the transfer:

One of the great advantages of such a system would be to take this Indian question—the administrative part of it—out of politics, and correct the frauds on the Indians, either in the original contracts for supplies or in the distribution of them, which has been for generations a reproach to every administration of our national affairs.

But it is unnecessary to quote further from the testimony of the officers; but one brigadier-general opposes the transfer. Out of sixty colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors, and captains, but two oppose the transfer. Civilians who have had experience among the Indians earnestly indorse the transfer as the only means of securing the Indian his rights under the treaties and avoiding wars with them, and nearly all the evidence pronounces their management under the Interior Department an utter failure. William Welsh, of Philadelphia, who was chairman of the board of Indian commissioners appointed by the President, and was an earnest worker for the civilization of the Indian, says in his testimony, speaking of the investigations of the board:

The governor of each Territory was ex officio the superintendent of Indian affairs and had the control of appropriations and usually shaped the expenditures politically. In some of the States that were formed out of Territories occupied by the Indians we were not able to trace above 25 per cent. of the appropriations to their proper use. That is, where the superintendent of Indian affairs had been the governor he had used the appropriation for political purposes, and in many instances gentlemen were promoted politically by the patronage of the appropriations for Indians.

And, although opposed to the transfer, he says:

If we cannot free the present system from violent political control, there would be very many advantages in the War Department beyond a doubt.

The board of Indian commissioners failed to free the management from political control, and Mr. Welsh retired therefrom and now acts independently in what he does for the Indians. For twenty-seven years the Indians have been under civil administration, and the evidence and results prove that it has been fraudulent to both the Government and the Indian and cost many lives by the wars it has provoked. The expense of Indian wars for the last twenty years is estimated at over $100,000,000. (See testimony of General J. B. Sanborn and Dr. Walter A. Burleigh, pages 213 and 216 committee's report.) The evidence and report of the Committee on Indian Affairs is as strongly in favor of the transfer. Both the committees reporting in favor of the transfer, the bill was passed in the House on April 21 last and went to the Senate, where it still remains without the action of that body.

On March 29 the House passed the bill reducing the pay of the Army officers. This bill reduced the expenses $500,000, reducing the pay of the higher grade of officers; the pay proper of colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains, and first lieutenants not being reduced; second lieutenants were reduced to $1,200 per annum not mounted and $1,300 per annum mounted, for the first four years' service only; chaplain's pay was reduced to $1,200 per annum, the pay of the enlisted men not being reduced; a reduction of eighty officers as extra adjutants and quartermasters, (regimental.) Fuel, officers' quarters, transportation, &c., make up the sum of reductions by this bill. That it was a reduction proper to be made in the present condition of the country will be readily seen by any one who will examine the following table:

BENJ. ALVORD,
Paymaster-General United States Army.

PAYMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE, March 6, 1876.

This bill also went to the Senate and remains there without action.

The bill for the re-organization of the Army passed the House June 1. It consolidated the ten cavalry regiments into eight and the twenty-five infantry regiments into twenty, consolidated the Quartermaster's and Subsistence Departments into one called the "Department of Supplies," reduced the number of staff officers and officers in Pay and Medical Departments, made no reduction in the privates, and it is believed left the Army in a better condition than with the larger number of regiments and fewer men to each. That the increased size of the companies by the consolidation of the regiments is economical and renders them more efficient is testified to by General Sheridan, as follows:

If you increase the size of the companies you diminish the expense. One great item of expense at present arises from the fact that the companies are so small as to be non-effective. In order to get an effective body of men for any purpose, it is necessary to take three or four companies from different places. That kind of management is, of course, expensive; and that is what we are obliged to resort to at present.

In making up the Army appropriation bill these reductions were considered, amounting to over $1,166,000 annually when all the reductions proposed were reached; but the Senate refused to agree, and the saving was lost for the present. This bill also provided for the traders at the military posts, restoring the post councils of administration, to prevent any recurrence of the recent disgraceful sales of post-tradership, which caused the downfall of one of the highest officials in the Department. That was bad enough, to rob the living soldier through the sale of the post-tradership, which compelled him to pay (through the high prices charged for his few necessaries outside of "hard-tack and bacon") the man who above all should have seen that he was protected from fraud; but it was not enough that the living should be robbed; the dead had also to come in for a share. Contracts for head-stones for the gallant dead were manipulated so as to reach favorites at prices higher than other bids, which by a unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs was pronounced a violation of law. In addition to this, grave charges (the investigations of which are not yet completed) are made against the management and control of the national homes for disabled volunteer soldiers.

From the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs it would seem that our naval affairs are in very bad condition, and its management so bad that the Secretary of the Navy is severely condemned, and a resolution referred to the Judiciary Committee to examine the testimony, and, if it warrants it, report articles of impeachment against him. The report is signed by eight of the eleven members of the committee; the minority report signed by three of the committee, receiving but 54 votes in the House, after an attempt to withdraw it had been made.

The following extracts from the testimony taken will explain why such a condition of affairs exists in the Navy. Rear-Admiral John J. Almy, commanding North Pacific squadron, says:

[Extract from reply to circular letter.]

Without meaning or intending the slightest disrespect, I will say, and consider it my duty to say when thus called upon to express an honest official opinion, that politics have been the bane of the Navy. If the workings of the Navy have been found to be wrong and rotten, politics have been at the bottom of it. It has been so with both political parties. I have been in the Navy for forty-seven years, and I speak the opinion of the day from my own knowledge.

Wherever a navy-yard is located, a member of Congress whose constituency is located in that vicinity and district has in many respects the command of that navy-yard, which I will explain:

At the present day the commandant at the navy-yard and other officials connected with it, who are responsible for the amount of work done and the money expended, have little or nothing to say about the taking on or the discharging of master-workmen, of foremen, or other mechanics, and therefore these officers should not be held accountable or responsible for the skillful character or the amount of work that is done. The member of Congress or a committee of the party in power regulates the appointment, admission, and discharge of the mechanics and workmen.

This political business is carried so far that the Mare Island navy-yard is called "Mr. Sargent's navy-yard," as he exercises all-powerful political control over nearly all the appointments and discharges of men.

It is even carried so far that Mr. SARGENT procured for a man the appointment of "bumboatman," (who supplies the sailors with fresh bread, fruit, &c.,) which indicated that the sailors must buy their little luxuries from this man, and no one else, without being permitted the privilege of a selection.

At other navy-yards it is about the same thing, which you will readily find by inquiry. I regret to say it, but it is unfortunately the fact. The Norfolk navy-yard was called "Mr. Platt's navy-yard," when he was in office and power. The Brooklyn and Charlestown navy-yards are usually called after the member of Congress of the navy-yard district, whoever he may be, for they all exercise this powerful influence and control. They know it and take delight in it. The Government, economy, and efficiency suffer by it, of which I am fully aware.

* * * * * * *

I have heard it stated many, very many times, and with semblance of truth, that officers of the Navy have inspected stores and material furnished by contractors, and also inspected work performed, and rejected them and refused payment on account of not coming up to the standard as specified in the contracts.

The Secretary of the Navy has, notwithstanding this, ordered the stores and material to be received and payment made for them and for work performed. But in these cases it has been as often alleged, and with semblance of truth too, that members of Congress, friends of the contractors, press upon and force the Secretary to this action.

Whether or not these evils can be and will be corrected depends upon you gentlemen of Congress. They certainly should be eradicated in order to insure integrity, economy, and efficiency in the administration of naval affairs.

Little did the gallant admiral think while writing the above from his flag-ship on the Pacific coast, thousands of miles away from "Mr. Platt's navy-yard" and Charlestown navy-yard, which he could with equal truth call "Mr. Frost's navy-yard," that he would be so fully confirmed in what he said as he is by the following extract taken from the reports in the contested-election cases in the districts named.

CHARLESTOWN NAVY-YARD.

It is clearly shown by the correspondence here inserted that the object of the Navy Department at Washington, and Hanscom, Chief of Bureau of Construction, was to secure a sufficient number of votes to insure the election of the sitting member.

[Private.]

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS, October 23, 1874.

MY DEAR COM.: I wish you would approve requisitions for men to be employed as they may be made until the 1st of November. Some fifty additional men has allowed from the Chelsea district, and I suppose some more will be required from Gooch's district. The Administration desire the success of Gooch and Frost.

Yours, respectfully,

I. HANSCOM.

Com. E. T. NICHOLS, U. S. N., Commandant.

(On envelope:) Revere House, Boston. Private. Com. E. T. Nichols, U. S. N., commandant navy-yard, Boston. (Exhibit B, G. M. H.)

The report of the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department recommended the dismissal of Hanscom for his connection with a fraudulent claim of Tilton, Wheelright & Co. for over $32,000, which was paid.

NAVY-YARD, BOSTON, NAVAL CONSTRUCTOR'S OFFICE,
December 4, 1874.

COMMODORE: In obedience to your order of this date, I respectfully report as follows:

Between the 1st and 31st of October last there was taken on the rolls of this department by requisition five hundred and eighty-six men.

The employment of these men was authorized by the Bureau's orders dated the 7th, 10th, 12th, and 16th October, 1874. * * *

Very respectfully,

J. W. EASBY,
Naval Constructor, U. S. N.

Commodore E. T. NICHOLS, U. S. N.,
Commandant Navy-Yard.

The evidence further shows, in this connection, that a large number of the employés, in consequence of having no work, were idle a great portion of the time, playing checkers, holding meetings, loafing, &c.

William B. Splaine, witness, (page 112:)

Interrogatory 3. Who was the foreman of your department in the fall of 1874?

Answer. Thomas J. Marston.

Int. 4. About how many men were then employed in his department on November 1, 1874?

A. Between forty-five and fifty-five men, as nigh as I can recollect.

Int. 5. How many of these men were actually employed on the Saint Mary while she was at the yard?

A. I should judge, on an average, not more than three or four.

Int. 6. Was there sufficient work to keep the men employed at in your department about November 1, 1874?

A. No.

Int. 7. Were there many men idle about that time?

A. I should judge about half, loafing around, doing nothing; no work for them.

Int. 8. About November 1, 1874, did you go through the various departments in the navy-yard during working hours? If so, please state what you saw.

A. I had occasion to go from where I worked several times to the blacksmith-shop, which was quite a distance, and also went to different shops in my department several times. Saw lots of men loafing in every place I went to. Saw men playing checkers during working hours. Saw men holding a kind of a meeting in a cellar under the place where I was at work.

Int. 9. How many men playing checkers; how many looking on?

A. Two playing; eight or ten looking on.

Int. 10. How many men were there at this meeting or caucus of which you have spoken?

A. The cellar was pretty full. I should judge there were between fifty and sixty men.

Int. 11. Did the men employed in the yard seem to be actively employed or otherwise?

A. Otherwise; they seemed to be loafing around, doing nothing; that is, the majority.

For once this interference failed of its object, the Committee on Contested Elections awarding the seat to Mr. ABBOTT, Mr. Frost being remanded to "his navy-yard."

"Mr. Platt's navy-yard," Norfolk, Virginia, seemed to be handled equally well, if not better, the men, as shown by the testimony, being assessed and notified on a regular printed form issued from the custom-house to the foreman in the yard, with orders to "make collections and mark paid, or why." They do not seem to have missed any one, from the foreman to the water-boy, as the following rates of assessment show:

Foreman	$20 00
Quarterman	10 00
Eighthman	5 00
First-class machinist	3 26
Second-class machinist	3 00
Laboring-man	1 76
Water-boy	1 02

That this assessment was carried out is shown by the following testimony of V. O. Cherry:

Question 6. Did you witness any intimidation of voters there that day, or see or hear anything from navy-yard officials calculated to influence the voting of the employés in the yard improperly? If so, please state all you know about it.

Answer. I live near the polls of the fourth ward, and was at the polls. I was at the polls, I guess, about twenty minutes after the polls opened, and staid until about twenty minutes of eight o'clock, time enough to get to the yard. I saw Mr. Barney Rutter—he is considered one of the leading men in the navy-yard—standing at the polls within six or eight feet of the ballot-box. He was the only one of the republican party at that time that had republican tickets. He would issue no tickets to any one unless they were in line going up to vote, and I heard him on several occasions tell the men not to put their hands in their pocket. I asked him why he done so. He told me he wanted to see how the men voted. I heard him refuse to give out tickets unless the men were in line.

Q. 7. Was he standing in a position so that he could see the voter from the time he received his ticket until it was deposited in the ballot-box?

A. He was.

Q. 8. Do you know whether any pecuniary assessment was made upon the men employed in the navy-yard for Mr. Platt's purposes in the campaign, and whether it was generally paid or not?

A. I do, sir. Mr. Burroughs, a quarterman in whose gang I was working at the time, brought a circular down to us between twelve and one p. m., and made use of the remark, "I have got something here for you men to look at and see what you are going to do." He showed it to us. He was assessed $10. First-class mechanics were assessed $3.26; second class, $3, or according to whatever a man got, he had to pay a day's pay.

Q. 9. Did the men, as a general thing, pay this money willingly or not?

A. They did not.

Q. 10. What, then, induced them to pay it?

A. I judge from fear of being discharged.

What greater indignity than this could be placed upon an American citizen, done too by the representative of the Government. If a private citizen did such an act with the workmen in his employ he would justly be held up to the scorn and contempt of his fellow-citizens. Under such a system it is no wonder that our Navy has gone backward of late years; and that it has, is shown by the replies of a large number of naval officers. I quote a sample from the reply of Rear-Admiral Jenkins, who says:

Fifteen or twenty years since we had the credit, and I think we justly deserved it then, of having, vessel for vessel, those superior to any in any foreign naval service of the same classes. Now, none so poor as to do us honor by offering us praise of anything naval, but for our discipline on board ship, exercises, cleanliness, healthiness of crews and officers, and of doing so marvelously well with our dull-steaming, overloaded, and often ridiculously-rigged (at the fitting yards) vessels. We are certainly very far behind most naval powers in our steam-machinery or the results from it. Want of speed and want of durability in our steam-marine engines and boilers are patent to every officer's mind who has been afloat and seen for himself foreign men-of-war.

Nearly all the officers who are familiar with the workings of the navy-yards testify to the baneful effects of politics in them. That it has been done by former Administrations is no excuse for the wrong done now. Let it be corrected, and keep the Army and Navy free from it hereafter; free from political control, that the people can always rely upon these two great arms of the service; free from political control, that their honor may never be tarnished, that they can at all times be relied upon to protect the interest of every citizen, without distinction of race, creed, party, or section. In the civil service let us have honesty, and capability in the administration of the affairs of the nation, a service that will deal honestly with all, from the millionaire to the laborer; let treaties made with the Indians be kept as sacred as any others, and we shall have fewer Indian troubles.

The plighted faith of the nation must be kept in the payment of its liabilities. Honesty and honor demand this, and the people indorse it. That this may be done, the strictest economy in the public expenditures is necessary, the funding of the public debt at the lowest possible rate of interest, and no further increase of the bonded indebtedness.

By act of Congress March 18, 1869, it was declared that—

The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold or silver. * * *

This act was passed to settle the question as to what money the bonds were payable in, and no matter what individuals may think in relation to it, is the law, and we must abide by it, and it certainly was to the interest of the holder of the bonds giving them coin for what they had paid notes for. At the time this act was passed the standard silver dollar was one of the silver coins authorized by law and was a legal tender for any amount, and of course under the act just recited was receivable for principal and interest on the bonds; but gold commanded a higher premium than silver, and it was to the interest of the bondholder to get gold if possible. The question being already settled by the law of 1869, they dared not ask the people openly for a further concession. The silver dollar stood in their way and had to be disposed of. How it was done may be seen from the proceedings in Congress on the act approved February 12, 1873, which shows that a bill reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to regulate the mints of the United States being before the House, the chairman, Mr. Hooper, of Massachusetts, offered a substitute, and on a motion to suspend the rules and pass it the following is reported in the Globe:

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose it is intended to have the bill read before it is put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The substitute will be read.

Mr. HOOPER. I hope not. It is a long bill, and those who are interested in it are perfectly familiar with its provisions.

Mr. KERR. The rules cannot be suspended so as to dispense with the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. They can be.

Mr. KERR. I want the House to understand that it is attempted to put through this bill without being read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] move that the reading of the bill be dispensed with?

Mr. HOOPER. I will so frame my motion to suspend the rules that it will dispense with the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the rules be suspended and that the bill pass, the reading thereof being dispensed with.

Mr. RANDALL. Cannot we have a division on that motion?

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules cannot be divided.

The motion of Mr. Hooper failed.

Mr. Hooper then moved that the rules be suspended and that the substitute for the bill be passed, and that the substitute be read.

The Clerk began to read the substitute.

Mr. BROOKS. Is that the original bill?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] applies to the substitute, and that on which the House is called to act is being read.

Mr. BROOKS. As there is to be no debate, the only chance we have to know what we are doing is to have both the bill and the substitute read.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts being to suspend the rules and pass the substitute, it gives no choice between the two bills. The House must either pass the substitute or none.

Mr. BROOKS. How can we choose between the original bill and the substitute unless we hear them both read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can vote "ay" or "no" on the question whether this substitute shall be passed.

Mr. BROOKS. I am very much in the habit of voting "no" when I do not know what is going on.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the question is taken on suspending the rules and passing the bill, I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will explain the leading changes made by this bill in the existing law, especially in reference to the coinage. It would seem that all the small coinage of the country is intended to be recoined.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. This bill makes no change in the existing law in that regard. It does not require the recoinage of the small coins. On the contrary, I understand that the Secretary of the Treasury proposes to issue an order to stop the coinage of all the minor coins, as there is now a great abundance of them in the country. The salaries are not increased; they remain as they were.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the salary of the subtreasurer at New York increased?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; it is not increased.

And this bill which was passed in the House without being read, under a suspension of the rules, upon the assurance of Mr. Hooper, the chairman of the committee, that the bill "made no change in the existing law," had concealed in it in the section relating to the silver coins the fact that the standard silver dollar was dropped from the list of coins of the United States, and all that are there named are not a legal tender in sums above $5. Thus was silver virtually demonetized, and the people deprived of its use in the payment of the interest on the public debt and the duties on imports, thus serving to keep up a higher premium on gold, which oppresses every interest in the country except the holder of the bonds. This was one of the boldest frauds that has been perpetrated by legislation against the interest of the people for many years, and the interest of the Government and justice to the people alike demand its repeal, restoring the standard silver dollar as one of the legal coins of the United States, and there is no legislation that can be enacted and carried out that will do more toward bringing the country to specie payments than this, and no one can say that it is not a just, honest, and fair measure to all.

The net saving of $29,944,252.86 makes an average of $95,668.54 saved for every working day.

Mr. Speaker, I have in the foregoing statement given the dates on which the appropriation bills passed the House, showing that all were passed in time for the action of the Senate before the close of the fiscal year. As an effort has been made to charge the House with the delay, I think it but just that the facts should be known. The Senate failed to pass the bills in time, and only a few days since we received from the Senate for the first time the river and harbor bill, which passed the House April 10. The bills as passed in the House show a reduction from last year's bills of $38,910,984.29, which would be a saving of $124,316.24 for every working day in the year, certainly an amount worth fighting for by a continuance of the session to this late day. That the necessities of the country demand economy and retrenchment, I need only refer to the following from the daily paper of the city in which I reside, under the date of August 2. It says:

OUR UNEMPLOYED.

At this time it is estimated that there are at least one thousand unemployed workmen in this city, and additions to their ranks are being made daily by suspensions from the company's shops. In some departments of the shops scarcely any hands are at work, while in all the number of employés has been greatly reduced. Some of the idle ones are unable to secure work, others have gone out into the country and are working on farms, while others have taken their departure for the West. The number of vacant houses in the city is now put down at one hundred and it is reasonably estimated that the number will be trebled inside of two months. The condition of affairs now existing in our city is the most distressing with which our people have been afflicted since the first days of the panic. Wages are lower and fewer men are employed. There is less work to do and gloomier prospects than ever before. Rents and the general cost of living remain about the same. A not very pleasant prospect, truly, yet a very truthful one. It is the same all over the country. When the better days shall come, the idle hands be put to work, and the thousands of hungering people provided with food to appease their hunger, Heaven only knows. That it may come speedily is the prayer of all. We must not, however, allow ourselves, no matter how great our afflictions, to give way to melancholy and evil forebodings. No possible good may come to us from such a course. Let us bear patiently the ills we have and hope and vote (if we think voting will accomplish it) for better times.

This in a city which contains not over fifteen thousand people, and in midsummer, certainly shows a deplorable state of affairs; and those that have employment with their wages reduced so that it scarcely affords them a living and a further reduction of time on this of two hours per day, giving them only four and eight-tenths days' work and pay per week, which puts it out of their power to aid their fellow-workmen who are unemployed. I am advised that in the district I have the honor to represent ordinary day laborers are receiving only from eighty cents to $1 per day; these men when wages were high and work plenty in former years received twice the sum of wages they do now. Why, then, should those employed in the service of the Government not be asked to bear a reduction of 10 per cent. when these men have been reduced 50 per cent.?

What says the Senate of the United States to this? They answer it is the law, and you cannot change it in an appropriation bill. Why, then, did they not frame and pass such a law as would permit the reductions? They could have done it in a bill of ten lines, and passed it in almost as many minutes. The House thought the appropriation bill sufficient law for the year for which it was made, but would willingly have met the Senate in passing a bill which would suspend the laws for the year. The Senate failing to meet this, what conclusion does it lead to? There can be but one, and that is that they were opposed to the reduction. Why? Not because the condition of the country and the finances did not demand it, not because wages and salaries of citizens outside of Government service were as high as those asked to be reduced by the bill. There seems to be no other reason for not making the reduction than that they were not willing that the House should have the credit for the large reduction, lest it might reflect upon them, or rather the Administration for not making the reductions in their estimates for this year as well as previous years. Salaries have been advanced in appropriation bills in previous sessions of Congress, and this having been done, there seems to be only reason and justice that they should be reduced in the same way. The opposition members of the House evidently did not take the view of it taken by the Senate, as the consular and diplomatic bill passed the House almost unanimously, the vote being 190 to 2. The salaries under that bill, ranging down from $17,500 in gold per annum, seemed a proper place for reduction, as the expense of living in almost all the foreign countries is greatly cheaper than our own. It may be possible that the fact that these gentlemen are mostly influential politicians had some bearing upon the fight made against the reduction of their salaries. The same might be said of the employés of the various Departments of the Government who hold the positions reached by the reductions proposed in the bills, no salaries being reduced except where they exceeded $1,200 per annum.

If further argument is necessary to show the necessity for the reduction of expenditures, the following tables will show it:

It will be seen from these tables that the net revenue has fallen from $333,738,204.67 in 1873 to $287,482,039.16 in 1876, a decrease of $46,256,165.51, while the expenditures were for 1873 $290,345,245, and appropriations for 1876 $293,166,177, an increase of $2,820,932. A business man or firm with such a state of affairs as these figures show would, if at all prudent and careful, at once investigate, and, if possible, make the income meet the expenses, and if at all doubtful, make the expenses less than the estimates. How was it with the gentlemen who manage the business for the Government? I find by reference to the Book of Estimates for the year ending June 30, 1877, page 176, that they ask for $314,612,608.48 for the expenses of this year, being $27,130,569.38 more than the receipts of the previous year. Now it cannot possibly be expected that the revenues will be more this year than last, as there has been a constant decrease since 1870; and it is so doubtful about the revenues more than meeting the reductions under the present bills that it is unsafe to reduce the taxation any, as it is impossible for any one to tell in the present distress what a year may bring about. For this reason the gentlemen who are anxious for a reduction of tariff were content to let it go over for another year, not finding the House or the country willing to bring further disaster upon the laboring and manufacturing interests of the country. In this they were wise. A well-regulated tariff that protects labor and brings the revenue so much needed now must always be a necessity and has ceased to be a question of section, and there is little danger of it ever being again made for the benefit of the foreign manufacturer and against the interest of our own people.

I firmly believe it is the interest of all our citizens of every section that we should always have a protective tariff for every article we produce, thus giving employment to labor at remunerative wages and making a home market for everything the farmer produces, as far as possible exporting the surplus. Such a system will soon relieve us of the drain of gold, much of which we pay for what we might as well manufacture here. The South, now happily emerging from the disasters of the war and its results, wants a protective tariff more than the North. Its rice and sugar are now receiving more than any agricultural production. The coming presidential election will probably be the last of the political turmoils that have been such a drawback to its financial progress. Its people, without regard to race, are tired of it; people North, of all parties, are tired of it, and the party leaders on either side will get but little comfort from the people in any effort to make capital out of the troubles they would perhaps be glad to make for political effect. These troubles ended, her citizens left free to develop the resources of the country, there is no reason why they cannot manufacture their own cotton, iron, and everything their States produce, and, with time, protection, and capital become as prosperous as their neighbors; and every one who loves his country must deprecate any action that tends to engender any bad feeling between the white and colored races there, as they must condemn any wrongful or illegal action of either against the other.
